MR. PARNELL said, he must really appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to whether it was his determination to maintain the attitude of adhering to the Rule of 1872 in preference to that of 1876? He thought the right hon. Gentleman might save a great deal of time, and might enable the House to proceed to a consideration of the Army Estimates, if, in deference to what was undoubtedly the feeling of a considerable section of the Opposition, he agreed to accept the principle of the latter Rule. The principle of the Rule of 1876 had the sanction which experience always gave; but, according to the evidence given before the Select Committee, the Rule of 1872 had been tried and found wanting. It was proposed by the Liberal Government of the day, and was strenuously resisted by the whole of the then Conservative Opposition (including the present Leader of the House), with the single exception of the present Secretary to the Treasury (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), who seemed to have a singular prescience that the Rule would not work, and who voted in favour of inquiry and examination into the whole question, before the House ventured to adopt so startling an alteration. He (Mr. Parnell) fully admitted that this was a two-edged weapon, and that it cut both ways. Still, he thought he might ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it was really worth his while to perpetuate a struggle of this kind? No doubt, the right hon. Gentleman might have entered into a very accurate mathematical calculation as to the amount of time which he might save by persisting in his present course of action. He might have seen that there was a prospect, if but a bare one, of getting his first Resolution carried that evening; and he might have thought that with that Resolution adopted, and becoming a Sessional Order of the House, he might by that means gain sufficient time during the rest of the Session to make up for the loss of one evening. But he (Mr. Parnell) would ask the House whether that was either a sensible or a statesmanlike view for a Government to take who were intrusted with such great responsibilities, and that, too, in connection with a proposal which cut directly at the root of a Constitutional principle? No doubt, the Members of the Government might say to themselves—"Our position is very powerful. We may occupy our seats here for years to come. There is no sign of cohesion in the Opposition, and there is no prospect of our rivals being in power." But, after all, things did sometimes alter. Sudden changes did occur. Great Powers had fallen in a moment. Napoleon III. appeared to have an assured maintenance of his position for years to come; but he fell suddenly, and although he (Mr. Parnell) did not suppose that the Zulu King would be able to bring about a catastrophe of a similar description, which would compel the Chancellor of the Exchequer to fly from his capital, no one knew what foreign complications might arise, or when the right hon. Gentleman might have to vacate his present high position. The Chancellor of the Exchequer could not hope to make the Rule of 1872 a Standing Order that evening; and he (Mr. Parnell) must really ask him whether it was worth his while to keep alive an element of contention of this description, and to face a renewal of the difficulties which had already risen in the House during the last eight or nine days? He did not wish it to be said that by any conduct on his part the privileges of the English Parliament were being diminished. The House of Commons had a great history, and although Irish Members might think their country had been injured by the necessity of having to seek justice in an English Legislature, they could not look back upon that history without feelings of some reverence for it, and for the exertions of the men who had raised the House to the position which it now occupied. But what were the

Sir Charles W. Dilke

Government now proposing to do? They were going to drive a nail into the work of their ancestors—men who won their liberties and who fought for them. It remained for the despised Irish Members to insist upon preserving the rights and liberties of the House. No equivalent would be gained by the Government for the loss which would be sustained in other directions were their proposal to be accepted.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) had appealed to him (Mr. Newdegate) as one who had had, for a long time, the honour of a seat in the House. The hon. Gentleman had spoken in support of the principle of the Rule of 1876; but it was to be hoped he would come to see, by degrees, that it would be neither for the advantage of the House, nor of the country, that the course which he recommended should be followed. The Resolution of 1872 was certainly to be preferred to that of 1876; or, rather, the substance of the one was to be preferred to the substance of the other. The hon. Member for Meath had laid great stress upon the ancient privileges of the House. Those privileges had been asserted quite as much by the forbearance of hon. Gentlemen as by their exacting the full extent of their rights; and what he (Mr. Newdegate) had seen convinced him that, under the Resolution of 1872, the practical Business of the House had been much more smoothly conducted than under the Resolution of 1876. If hon. Members would but recall what took place between those years—1872 and 1876—and compare the course of Business during the Sessions between those dates with what had occurred since 1876, they, he thought, must come to the conclusion that the House had been able to perform its duties better in every sense, between 1872 and 1876, than it had been able to do since.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he now desired to move the Amendment which stood in his name on the Paper. The proposal which he submitted to the House was in the following terms:—

“To add at the end of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's first Resolution, ‘except an Amendment relative to the Class of Estimates which has been set down for consideration on that day be moved, in which case Mr. Speaker shall be bound to propose the question in respect of such Amendment: Provided always, That the Member of the Government who proposes to move the Estimates upon that day may make his statement with Mr. Speaker in the Chair.’”

No doubt, the first portion of his Amendment had been already discussed; but the second part of it imported, as he thought, a very beneficial colouring into the whole matter. He had already touched on the question, and he was rather disappointed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had taken no notice of what he had been urging. The object of that second portion was to enable a Minister, charged with the duty of giving a Statement to the House as to certain Estimates, to make that Statement while the Speaker was in the Chair. He had been very much disappointed to find that, in the remarks which were made a short time previously by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, his right hon. Friend entirely passed over the appeal which he had made to him in reference to this subject; and he must again endeavour to impress its importance upon the House and upon the Government. The proposal which he now made not only rested upon the recommendation of very high authorities, but it would be attended with obvious advantages in facilitating that despatch of Business, which it was the object of the Resolutions of the Government to promote. It would enable a Minister to rise and make his Statement about 5 o'clock in the afternoon, when the House was full, when the Minister himself was fresh, and when the Statement would be delivered in time for post and telegraph. By adopting the proposal which he urged upon the attention of the Government, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would get rid of the scandal of a hungry Minister making an important speech in an almost empty House at 9 or 10 o'clock; and that, in his opinion, ought to more than compensate the Government for anything they might give up by agreeing to accept his proposal. Hon. Members might put the matter to the most practical test by considering what would have been their own experience that very night if the House were doing and not talking of Business, and if his proposal had been in operation. Long before the hour on which he himself was at that time speaking the Minister for War would have been able to make his Statement, instead of having, either under the old Rule, or that of 1872—it being a Monday and the first night of the Army Estimates—to wait till a series of Amendments had been disposed of, and either get up at some late hour, or be altogether thrown over for the night. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman who led their deliberations to give peace and contentment to the House by agreeing to a proposition which would not only facilitate the despatch of Business, but afford an additional privilege to Ministers themselves.

Amendment proposed.

At the end of the First Resolution, to add the words “except an Amendment relative to the Class of Estimates which has been set down for consideration on that day be moved, in which case Mr. Speaker shall be bound to propose the question in respect of such Amendment: Provided always, That the Member of the Government who proposes to move the Estimates upon that day may make his statement with Mr. Speaker in the Chair.”—(Mr. Beresford Hope.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was not insensible to the value of the Proviso which his hon. Friend who had just spoken (Mr. Beresford Hope) proposed to attach to his Amendment. No doubt, on the first occasion of bringing forward the Army and Navy Estimates, that Proviso would be of great convenience, and would facilitate the Business of the House. That, however, was not the point which they had now to consider. The question which had been raised, and with which the House had to deal, was as to how they were to conduct the Business during the whole of the Session upon questions of Supply. According to the proposal of his hon. Friend, all through the Session, whenever Supply was put down, it would be competent for hon. Members to bring forward Motions relative to the class of Estimates set down for consideration; but it was obviously very difficult to say—and this was one of the great objections to the working of the Rule of 1876—what Amendments were or were not relative to the class of Estimates so set down. By a little ingenuity a very large number of Amendments might be brought within that term—such, for instance, as the conditions under which Kew Gardens should be open to the public. Now, what he desired was to secure certainty in the discussion of the Estimates, so that the time of the House should not be wasted; and he hoped, therefore, the House would at once come to a division, and not go again over the arguments which had been so repeatedly urged.

MR. SYNAN said, he could not understand on what possible ground the Chancellor of the Exchequer could object to the use of the word “relative” in the proposal of the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope), as that word occurred in all the Amendments to the Resolution, including the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had accepted. Surely, either the Speaker or the Chairman of Committees would be competent to decide such a point, when they were asked to decide the question as to whether a particular Motion was in Order. The effect of adopting the Resolution of the Government would be to curtail and narrow the rights and privileges of hon. Members without facilitating the despatch of the Business of the House. The Amendment of the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge facilitated the Business of the House without encroaching on those rights, and he therefore supported it.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he could not see that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had yet brought forward any sound argument in favour of the proposition which he had submitted to the House. Hon. Members must retain and not lose the rights and privileges they at present possessed.

MR. PAGET suggested that if the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) would withdraw his Proviso, which seemed to him (Mr. Paget) to rest on an entirely different ground to the main body of the Amendment, it would be easier for the House to come to a clear understanding on the matter. The Amendment would then become practically the same as that of the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot); and it would, in that case, better recommend itself to the adoption of the House.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he could not consent to do so, as the withdrawal of the Proviso would spoil the symmetry of the system embodied in his Amendment.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he entirely agreed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that this not very large question had been debated as much as it could be. He therefore should not have said anything more on the subject except for the statement made by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), who had said that he (the Marquess of Hartington) had shown a decided preference for the Rule of 1876 over that of 1872. He did not think that anyone had shown any preference of that kind except his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt). The importance of the difference between them had been greatly exaggerated; but if he had a preference for either of them, it was for the Resolution of 1872, under the working of which no hon. Member had thought himself injured by being shut out or excluded from bringing any question to which he attached any importance under the consideration of the House. The Rule of 1872 was not, as the hon. Member for Meath had stated, abandoned because it was not found to work well. It worked, so far as he knew, perfectly well, and without producing any complaint; but it was abandoned by the Government during the first Session of their existence, because the state of Business was such that they did not feel the necessity for its continuance which they now felt. The suggestion which he made the other night, although not accepted in its entirety by the Government, still, he thought, pointed to a remedy in this matter. If the Government refused to discuss a point in dispute on the Estimates, a Member had another opportunity of bringing forward the subject when the Resolutions relating to the Estimates were reported to the House. As regarded Kew Gardens, the hon. Member for Galway need not be under any alarm, as he would have a full opportunity of raising the question upon the Motion for the payment of the salary of the officers. He should certainly support the Rule of 1872 as proposed by the Government.

MR. PARNELL, in apology, said, he must certainly have made a mistake if he had said that the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) had ever shown any decided preference for the Rule of 1876 as compared with that of 1872; because the noble Lord had never shown any decided preference for anything as compared with another.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 79; Noes 191: Majority 112.-- (Div. List, No. 20.)

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, who had an Amendment upon the Paper, to add the words—

“Unless on going into Committee an Amendment be moved relevant to the Votes to be considered on that day,” said, after the vote just given by the House, he should not move it.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, in that case, he would do so, with the addition of the words “or Question asked” after the word “moved,” in order to draw attention to a subject which had not yet been sufficiently discussed. If the Resolution was passed as it now stood, a Member would have no opportunity of calling attention to a subject, or of asking a question on any matter, however relevant it might be, unless he moved a definite Resolution.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the First Resolution, to add the words “unless on going into Committee an Amendment be moved or Question asked relevant to the Votes to be considered on that day.”—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

MR. NEWDEGATE hoped the House would very gravely pause before it adopted the Amendment. One of the great difficulties at the present time was that hon. Members called attention to subjects without giving the body of the House any opportunity of expressing their opinion thereon. Such a vast enlargement of the privilege of asking Questions had taken place of late years, that he thought the House ought to be careful before it granted any further enlargement, or how it permitted a Member to draw attention to a subject, and set on foot a discussion which might last the whole evening, without the House having an opportunity of expressing its opinion thereon.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER thought the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) might just as well say that no Questions should be asked at half-past 4 o'clock; that was the logical conclusion of his argument.

MR. RYLANDS: I am rather surprised that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) should raise an objection to the proposal of the hon. Baronet, because it is in accordance with the course hitherto followed, and which has been found of great convenience, by giving an opportunity for discussion on a Question being put involving a certain amount of argument. I am quite sure, if the hon. Member (Mr. Newdegate) will recall his own experience, he will remember that convenience has arisen from discussions of that character. We have an instance at hand at the present moment on the Motion for going into Committee of Supply this evening. The hon. Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) has given Notice that he will call attention to the subject of the occupation of Cyprus, and ask certain Questions. I happen to know that my hon. Friend does not intend to bring this subject on to-night; but I mention it, as it is clearly one of the kind of Questions which, with great propriety, might be brought forward on going into Committee of Supply; and the hon. Baronet might put to the Government Questions on a matter of great public interest, coupled with certain statements, which he would not be enabled to make at the Question time at half-past 4 o'clock. But I wish, Mr. Speaker, to appeal to you in this matter, on which I am inclined to hold an opinion contrary to that of the hon. Member for Chelsea. If a Notice of this kind had been put down on the Paper, a Notice relevant to the class of Estimates, would it be competent under the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), for the hon. Member for Chelsea to raise the question without absolutely putting his Notice in the form of an Amendment? Perhaps, Sir, if you would give an opinion on this point, it might remove the necessity of altering the words of the Resolution as now proposed, and I do think that such a Notice should be permitted under the Standing Order of the House.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he could not see how the Government could refuse to accede to the principle of the proposal now made.

Mr. O'Connor Power

MR. SPEAKER, in reply to the question of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), said, that in the event of the House passing the Resolution before it, with the addition of the Amendment about to be moved by the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), if an Amendment relevant to the class of Votes proposed to be taken were moved and negatived, it would not be competent for the House to divide on any other Amendment, even though it were relevant; but the subject-matter of such Amendment might be discussed. If on the Motion to go into Committee, an hon. Member rose in his place, even though he had no Amendment on the Notice Paper, it would be his (Mr. Speaker's) duty to assume that the hon. Member intended to conclude with a Motion, or to address himself to the Question before the House; and therefore he could not prevent him from proceeding to address the House.

MR. RITCHIE said, that the Amendment merely put into a definite form that which was already the practice of the House.

MR. DODSON thought the Amendment was not necessary, and they were only wasting their time by beating in the air.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he should not, after the explanation which had been given, put the House to the trouble of a division.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT moved the insertion of the following words:—

“Unless an Amendment be moved relating to the Class of Estimates proposed to be taken in Supply on first going into Committee on the Army, Navy, and Civil Services respectively.”

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the First Resolution, to add the words “unless an Amendment be moved relating to the Class of Estimates proposed to be taken in Supply on first going into Committee on the Army, Navy, and Civil Services respectively.”—(Sir Walter B. Barttelot.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE moved to amend the proposed Amendment by inserting the words “or Question raised” after the word “moved.” That would raise the question whether an hon. Member who merely wished to call attention to a relevant subject without Motion or Amendment would be at liberty to do so.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, after the word "moved," to insert the words "or Question raised."—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was intended that an hon. Member should be at liberty to do so. In that view, the Amendment of the hon. Baronet was perfectly reasonable, and he would agree to it.

Question put, and agreed to.

Question again proposed,

"That the words 'unless an Amendment be moved or Question raised relating to the Class of Estimates proposed to be taken in Supply on first going into Committee on the Army, Navy, and Civil Services respectively,' be there added."

MR. WHITWELL moved the omission of the words "Class of," so as not to confine the discussion to any one class of Estimates.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "Class of."—(Mr Whitwell.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the proposed Amendment was immaterial, and he would agree to it.

Question, "That the words 'Class of' stand part of the proposed Amendment," put, and negatived.

Question again proposed,

"That the words, 'unless an Amendment be moved or Question raised relating to the Estimates proposed to be taken in Supply on first going into Committee on the Army, Navy, and Civil Services respectively,' be there added."

MR. MITCHELL HENRY proposed further to amend the proposed Amendment by the substitution for the words "the Civil Service Estimates" of the words "the several Classes of the Civil Service Estimates." Many of those classes differed widely from each other, and if the Amendment were not agreed to, the Irish Members would be debarred the opportunity of discussing questions in which they were much interested. Hon. Members would then be driven to use every possible privilege they still retained, and, instead of Business being advanced, it would be very much retarded.

MR. DILLWYN seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

After the words "Navy and," to insert the words "the several Classes of the."—(Mr. Mitchell Henry.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. DODSON thought a reference to the Rule of 1872 would simplify the matter. The words used in that Rule were, "the several divisions of the Estimates."

MR. BIGGAR, in supporting the Amendment, remarked that the ostensible cause of these new Rules was the obstruction of a small number of Irish Members. He denied that there had been any obstruction, except in the case of the South African Bill.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that the Amendment would really shorten the Monday Business, and he would counsel the Chancellor of the Exchequer to accept it. If the Civil Service Estimates were broken up into classes, he supposed the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not take more than one class each night, while the Minister representing that class would offer his explanation. Such a classification, in his opinion, was quite necessary.

MR. ANDERSON contended that the Amendment was a reasonable one, and hoped the Government would not oppose it, as it would give an opportunity to the House to discuss more than one question relating to the Civil Service Estimates on one day, which was no more than right, seeing there were at least seven branches as dissimilar from each other as from the Army or Navy.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the condition sought to be attached to the Resolution would do very much away with the advantage of the Rule. He thought quite enough was given, considering the many opportunities there would be for discussing any question that might arise, if one day were set apart for the discussion of any of the questions affecting the Civil Service Estimates. If the Estimates were sub-divided into classes, the time of the House would be really frittered away, without any corresponding advantage. He did not think it was proposed to carry the Amendment so far as was suggested.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE thought that what Government lost in one way it would gain in another; because on going into, say, the Education Votes, it would be impossible to raise any question on Public Parks.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON ventured to think that if the House at any time desired to have further information of the Minister in charge of the Estimates, it would be able to obtain it; that a general discussion could be raised upon any part of the Estimates; and that the Secretary to the Treasury would not be able to force them on. That information could be obtained if the House passed the Resolution as agreed to by the Government. Though the Resolution were passed, it would not necessarily follow that Monday would be the only day on which Estimates would be taken. Hon. Members might, therefore, rely on having ample opportunities for the discussion of the Estimates. It was never contemplated that there should be such a sub-division of Estimates as was now suggested. The Rule was introduced in 1876 by the noble Lord at the head of the Government in the form in which it had worked well in 1872-3; and although it was amended, that did not imply any admission that it had not worked satisfactorily.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, the Amendment would raise a practical difficulty to reporting Progress in the middle, say, of Class 1, and on a subsequent night finishing that class and proceeding with, say, Classes 2 and 3; because Class 1 would not be entered upon then for the first time, so that no Amendment could be moved on going again into Committee upon it, whilst Classes 2 and 3, though they might have been down on the Paper the first night, would not actually have been begun. This alteration would render it necessary, therefore, to take only one class each night, and would be productive of great inconvenience. As the Rule only applied to one night, and the Government had made several concessions, they might pass the Resolution as it stood.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, it was admitted there should be an opportunity of discussing each division of the Estimates before going into Committee; the different classes of the Civil Service Estimates were as important as the Army or the Navy Estimates; and it was the business of the Ministers to devise the words by which the necessary latitude should be assured and not to leave hon. Members at the mercy of any particular Minister who might bring on the Estimates. If the Government did not accept the Amendment, the variety of topics that would have to be mooted on going into Committee on any division of the Estimates would render it impossible that any abuse, however serious, could secure sufficient attention from the House and the Government. They ought to put a limit to the concessions now being made to the Government.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, the alternative to the Amendment proposed would be Amendments in Committee of Supply; but that would not be a satisfactory mode of discussing some grievances.

MR. PARSELL said, the Government apparently desired to drive independent Members to obstruction; he did not mean now, but in the future course of Business, for as such it would be regarded to impede the Report of Supply at the time it was often brought on. That stage was often taken at such an hour that any discussion on the Estimates became impossible. This Rule was, therefore, an incentive to the adoption of methods of Parliamentary warfare which ought to be seldom resorted to. It was impossible to conclude that the Rule adopted in 1872 would work well now, because since 1872 the Civil Service Estimates had very much increased. The Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Galway was, therefore, one that raised a most important question.

MR. ERRINGTON thought the major portion of the arguments which had been adduced were decidedly in favour of the proposal of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry). He (Mr. Errington) thought, however, that the Government might consent to a compromise. Several of the classes of Estimates were, of course, more important than others, and he would suggest that some of the least important should be grouped together. For instance, the Classes numbered 1 and 2 might be grouped; Class 3, or the Administration of Justice, would, of course, deserve a night to itself; Class 4, Education, would also deserve a night; and he proposed that Classes 5, 6, and 7 should be taken together, and one night devoted to them; so that instead of seven nights being required for the Civil Service Estimates, they would need only four. That was a less concession than hon. Members asked for, but one worthy of the consideration of the Government.

MR. O'DONNELL said, the fact that the Government would not accept the Amendment would impose upon independent Members the obligation of taking steps to counteract what the Government wished to impose, which was nothing more than an attempt to stop the exposition of grievances in respect to the Civil Service Estimates; and he really thought there could not be a scheme better calculated to bring the authority of this House into contempt, and better calculated to shake the confidence of the nation, than the scheme which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had presented to them. When hon. Members took an undue advantage of a liberal and generous regulation of debates, they could only do so at the imminent risk and at the practical certainty of finding themselves condemned not only by the Government whom they disturbed, but by the country at large. On the other hand, when Members, in obedience to a public duty, and in recognition of the claims of men who came to them and asked that their grievances should be exposed in Parliament, could only obtain a hearing by adopting some Parliamentary chicane, and getting round and about the devices of Government, they would not be condemned by the country at large for obstruction, but they would be applauded. Under even a generous regulation, Members had sometimes to push the liberty of discussion to its utmost limits, and Members had been found to do that with reasonable ground, and an irritated Government did not dare to take measures to punish their objectionable action. Under these circumstances, he asked the Government to consider, would Members of similar resolution hesitate for one single moment to challenge the displeasure of the Government when they had such a good excuse and ground for setting at naught the threats of Government penalties as these Resolutions practically set forth? It was perfectly true, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said, that if they looked at the Rules and Orders of the House generally, the proposed restrictions of the Government would not in the slightest degree interfere with the liberty of independent Members, if such Members were only resolute in maintaining their liberties. He meant to say that if the Government refused to allow independent Members a fair opportunity of expressing their grievances, those Members certainly, by making use of the forms of the House, could contrive a means and find an opportunity to bring their grievances forward, and irregular in reality though they might be, nevertheless their conduct would be regular in outward seeming, and would be according to Parliamentary form. What the Government said in effect to the independent Members was that they did not propose to interfere with their liberties, because they knew that would be useless on their part; yet by way of improving the conduct of debates in that House, they intended to force them to give up bringing forward their grievances in a regular form, and compel them to avail themselves of irregular opportunities. This was the notion which the Government entertained of raising the dignity of that House in the eyes of the country. It was unfortunate that the Amendment of the hon. Member for the county of Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had been introduced in a thin House, and in the almost total absence of all Government authority, because no more important Resolution had been proposed during the period that matter had been under discussion. The Government had admitted the principle that special opportunities ought to be given for the discussion of grievances relating to the Army and Navy, when the Estimates relating to those Services were going to be brought forward, yet they denied that there existed the same necessity of giving facility to discuss grievances in relation to the Civil Service Estimates when those Estimates were to be proceeded with. Nothing could be more illogical than the position of the Government on that point, and nothing could be more aggravating. They seemed to be desirous of provoking an opposition to their views from certain

hon. Members which would enable them to propose a still further curtailment of their liberties. That they should be simply a recording Assembly, and take their cue from the Government of the day, was doubtless an idea which might commend itself to Members of the Cæsarist School, of which there were many in that House; but in the Civil Service Estimates they had to deal with diplomatic changes, with education, and with very many other subjects of the highest importance to the whole community—subjects which were more prolific of discussion than all the Votes of the Army and Navy Estimates put together. There was not much reason for discussion on the Army and Navy Estimates as a rule, because those Estimates did not enter into the domain of Party politics, both Parties in the House being interested in having an efficient Army and Navy; and only for the large number of officers who were in the House it was extremely probable the Estimates of those two Services would pass over quietly and after brief discussion, and with just a minimum of amicable conversation between the experts of the House. But the Civil Service Estimates covered ground of a very large extent, and they absolutely bristled with controversy. Those Estimates included such subjects as the administration of the Poor Law, Education, the Revenue, the Post Office, the Telegraph Service, and numberless other matters, while 99 per cent of the citizens of the Empire took no interest in the Army and Navy Estimates beyond the natural and moderate interest of knowing that they were being fairly conducted. On the other hand, 99 per cent of the people were obliged to take a deep interest in the Civil Service Departments, because their best and dearest interests were affected by them. Now, these Estimates were to be more and more withdrawn from the cognizance of Parliament; and by the proposal of the Government it appeared to be the intention of the Government to keep the people more and more from a knowledge of their own affairs. If it was the intention of the Government to rule without criticism and without observation, if it was their wish to do everything they pleased with the Civil Service Estimates, if they wanted to job and re-job, to be extravagant or parsimonious just as they pleased, to introduce arbitrary rules, to interfere with the discipline of prisons, to meddle with the conduct of education, to make and unmake in a hundred different ways without giving the people an opportunity of knowing what was going on, the policy which the Government was pursuing was just the one to accomplish those objects. Their proposals were a provocation to Members to combine together in order to interfere with the progress of Public Business, so that they might have something like an opportunity of bringing forward their grievances. The plan of the Government, therefore, instead of facilitating Business, would simply prove a stumbling-block. Their conduct was reconcilable with no theory of public government except that of Cæsarist rule, and ruling behind the backs of the people. The Government were proud of their majority, and as regarded their foreign policy, he believed, represented the views of the country, at least of the English people; but if they were to persevere with that attempt to stop grievances being heard on the Civil Service Estimates, they would find they had lost more in the country that they had gained by their foreign policy.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 49; Noes 88: Majority 39.—(Div. List, No. 21.)

Question again proposed,

“That the words ‘unless an Amendment be moved or Question raised relating to the Estimates proposed to be taken in Supply on first going into Committee on the Army, Navy, and Civil Services respectively,’ be there added.”

MR. O'DONNELL said, that in the interest of Ireland he felt bound to endeavour to obtain some opportunity for the discussion of Irish subjects in the Civil Service Estimates. He would therefore move an Amendment to insert words in the Resolution which would give an opportunity for raising discussion on going into Committee on the Classes of the Estimates relating to “Law, Justice, Education, and Public Works of Ireland.” No one could say that was an obstructive Amendment. The Departments he had named were of the first importance conditioning the progress and prosperity of Ireland in the most vital manner. The conduct of the Government, on more than one occasion, supplied them with a precedent for making the present demand. They had, on more than one occasion, set apart a special day for the consideration of the Irish Classes of the Estimates, much to the convenience of Irish Members who wished to attend, and to the convenience of other Members who wished to be absent. Even though a powerful contingent of Ministerial supporters might be waiting to give Irish opinion its usual coup de grace, still it would be a satisfaction to the Irish people to know that their grievances had been brought forward.

MR. BIGGAR seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment,

After the word "Services," to insert the words "and the Classes relating to Law, Justice, Education, and Public Works in Ireland."—
(Mr. O'Donnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER deprecated the insertion of the words proposed. He very much doubted whether they would have the effect of getting greater attention paid to Irish questions than under the proper application of the present system. He was sure the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), and those who sat near him, would themselves acknowledge that there was always a desire on the part of the Government so to arrange questions relating to Ireland that hon. Members might have an opportunity of discussing them on the Estimates. It had frequently happened that Irish Votes had been postponed for a considerable time for the convenience of Irish Members. He could assure hon. Gentlemen from Ireland that that was the spirit in which the Government desired to work, and that they always wished to consult the convenience of Irish Members by fixing such days for the discussion of Estimates relating to Ireland as might be convenient to them.

MR. BIGGAR, in supporting the Amendment, pointed out that, with a special night for Irish subjects, the argument as to convenience would apply as well to discussion before going into Committee as to discussion in Committee. They had heard much of obstruction which had occurred during the present Parliament, and which, in his opinion, was without a parallel. A Bill called the Agricultural Holdings Bill was before them night after night, and hours were spent upon its consideration; and yet he understood that it had never to this day been in operation in any degree in any part of England.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE opposed the Amendment. Its effect would be to give Irish Members an unfair advantage, and he did not see why Irish Members should have special opportunities of discussing their grievances which were not given to English and Scotch Members.

MR. M'LAREN said, he generally voted with the hon. Members from Ireland for the removal of their grievances when these were real; but in the case of a fanciful grievance, which he held the one spoken of to be, he could not vote with them. There was a vast difference between the case of the removal of certain disabilities which he believed the Irish people did labour under and the present case, where they were not content with equality, but demanded superiority over England and Scotland. The description of Estimates mentioned in the Amendment were applicable to England and Scotland as much as to Ireland. Were the Irish Members to be allowed to bring forward, for instance, a Motion with regard to the administration of law in Ireland, and the Scotch Members not to be allowed an equal right to bring forward a Motion in regard to the administration of law in Scotland? In Ireland, for example, they got out of that Class of Estimates two or three times as much as Scotland; and why should Scotland not have the right to bring forward her great grievance in reference to her treatment in this respect compared with Ireland that got so much, while Scotland got so little? This being a claim not for equality, but for superiority, he must vote against the Amendment.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER, referring to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement that the Irish Members had always had great facilities given them for bringing forward their grievances, said, he must be allowed to point out that what had happened before in reference to Irish grievances was no criterion of what would happen in future in consequence of the passing of the first Resolution. The hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) had delivered what he doubtless considered was a conclusive speech. He asked why Irish Members should want the privilege of raising questions on going into Committee of Supply, when English and Scotch Members would have no such privilege? But if English and Scotch Members voluntarily surrendered their privileges, the Irish Members were made of different and sterner stuff. It might be that public virtue would take refuge amongst the Irish Members, and they alone might be permitted to make a stand to maintain the Constitution. Moreover, there was a great difference between the Irish and the English Civil Service Estimates. He remembered a case in point. A public meeting was held in Phoenix Park, Dublin. The Irish Government issued orders to the police to disperse the meeting by force, and that was actually done. Now, no one would contend that that was not a subject that might be fairly brought before the House of Commons. It was so brought before the House of Commons. The Irish Government repented of its conduct before a week had elapsed, and the meeting was held after all in the place it was intended to be held. The Irish Government receded from its position, and it was afterwards adjudged blamable in the Courts of Justice. But what would have happened if it had not been possible to bring forward the smallest grievance on going into the Irish Estimates? It would not have been in the power of any Irish Member, under this first Resolution, to call attention to that violation of Constitutional power. He therefore maintained that the circumstances would be entirely changed if this Resolution became a Rule of the House. For these reasons, it appeared to him that the hon. Member for Dungarvan had acted wisely and judiciously in proposing this Amendment, and if it were carried to a division he should certainly give it his hearty support.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, he was always desirous of meeting the views of Irish Members if he could possibly do so: he admired the eloquence of the Irish Representatives, even if their arguments failed to convince him, and he thought they would be quite as able as English or Scotch Members to find opportunities for bringing their grievances before the House.

Mr. O'Connor Power

Why should Irish Members desire additional privileges? They ought to blush to make such a demand. What did it virtually mean? That, whilst all other Members were clever enough to find means to bring their grievances before the House in the ordinary way, Irish Members alone were not competent to do so. As a friend to Ireland, he indignantly denied such an imputation upon her Representatives. Some Irish Members had, during the course of the debate, spoken as if there were those in the House who thought themselves superior to Irish Members. He was sure he might disclaim such an idea on behalf of every Member of the House; and, for his own part, he should be very sorry to lose the Members from the sister country. But he could not see why Irish Members alone should require special opportunities of bringing their grievances before the House. He dissented from any attempt to separate Irish Members from the great body of the House; and the House would be paying no compliment to the Irish Members by offering them such special protection as they claimed.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, no matter how eloquent the speeches of the Irish Members, the grievances had remained; but they should cease, whether Irish affairs were managed in London or in Dublin. If not, they would see, as at present, compliments coming from the front Opposition Bench and stern refusal from the Government. He saw before him the Gentleman representing Hyde Park (Mr. Noel), the Gentleman who represented the work-houses (Mr. Sclater-Booth), and others; but where was the Chief Secretary; he was not in his place? Under the present system one Minister was responsible for every Irish Department, often a young man without claims on Ireland, and totally unacquainted with her position, and even without official training. He was completely in the hands of the officials in Dublin. The system was entirely separate from that which prevailed in England. It only required a man to show some ability in the matter of Irish affairs—as the late Chief Secretary did—and to show he was capable of doing something, to have him promoted, and another person sent in his stead. They might send constabulary soldiers to spy over the sermons in churches; but it was only when Press attacks were made on the Lord Lieutenant that notice was taken of such an occurrence. That state of things could not occur in England, and would not occur in Ireland if ample opportunity were given to expose special abuses. Scotland was part and parcel of this Kingdom, and her affairs were managed at the Home Office. That was not the case with Ireland. He could assure the House that something more than an assimilation of the laws was required before Ireland became prosperous. The country wanted careful, well watched, and impartial administration. Heretofore, the administration had not been careful or impartial—it had been full of abuses, and until these defects were remedied there would be no respect for British laws in Ireland.

MR. SULLIVAN said, it had been suggested that Irish Members wanted to be supplied with facilities beyond the Rules of the House; but what really was the case was that the Irish Members said if the Government were going to restrict the liberties of the House hitherto enjoyed they, at least, would oppose it. They were standing there in defence of existing privileges, and not to ask for any special favour. Their position in the struggle they were making that night was not for the purpose of hindering the progress of the debate on the Rules in any way; but it was because the Irish Members believed sincerely the Government wished to take from them almost the last advantage which they possessed as Members from Ireland. It was argued that as they were steadily voted down by an arithmetical majority, and that nothing they could say would convert the majority, they had better hold their tongues. His answer was that there was a great advantage in their using their place in Parliament for leavening the public opinion of Parliament and the country, and of enlightening them on the way in which Ireland was governed, and the way in which she ought to be governed. The late Chief Justice Whiteside said the country was governed by Larcom and the police. Larcom, he might tell the House, was the Under Secretary of Dublin Castle, and why had he the government of the country in his hands? Because the House was too busy to think about discussing those questions on the Irish Estimates, which really concerned the Government of Ireland. Mr. Horsman, who graduated in Ireland, as did also the late Chief Secretary before he was appointed to look after the Zulus, was asked to say how he governed the country, and his reply was that he did the hunting and Carlisle did the dancing. Since 1874, however, Ireland had a real representation in the House; and at the peril of incurring the misunderstanding of the House, and often even facing its anger, Members had stood there to insist on debating, and thoroughly debating, Irish questions—often inconveniently, sometimes, perhaps, with somewhat of ill-temper, but still discussing them usefully. Whatever progress had been made in England—and there had been great progress in England within the last few years towards a better understanding of Irish questions, and towards a more friendly feeling between the two countries—was consequent on the excitation of English feeling by the debates on Irish grievances; and he had no hesitation in saying that Coercion Bills and Prison Bills, such as existed in Ireland, would not be tolerated in England so long if the English people had better known of their existence. He appealed to the House not to curtail the liberties of the Irish Members; because the present was the only arrangement by which they could protest against a majority which ignored the opinions of the Irish people constitutionally expressed.

MR. PARNELL said, he thought the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) was a little unreasonable in denying to the Irish Members the right of doing something for themselves. The hon. Member had referred to other parts of the Kingdom. Those for whom he (Mr. Parnell) spoke would not be opposed to an extension of the principle which they claimed for themselves to Scotland and to England. On the contrary, he firmly believed that his hon. Friend (Mr. O'Donnell) would willingly agree, if the House desired it, to alter his Amendment so as to include those two countries. At the same time, many of the Irish Representatives believed that there were reasons why, perhaps, Ireland might ask to be exceptionally treated in this matter. There was a very exceptional Government in Ireland, which, practically, consisted of the Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, who occasionally strolled into the House to see how the amusement was progressing. The Irish Members had not the opportunities which were enjoyed by English and Scotch Representatives of urging their grievances, in connection with the various Departments, upon the attention of the Legislature, and they were few in number in a House consisting of 650 Gentlemen. They were thus placed at a disadvantage from the start in balloting for a place on going into Committee of Supply; and that disadvantage would be increased one hundredfold by the action of the Resolution of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if it were to be adopted without the Amendment which was now urged. That Amendment appeared to him to be a very small and reasonable proposition. The Leader of the House knew perfectly well that the Irish Members had in no instance misused the privileges which they now possessed; that the questions which they had brought forward had been few in number; and that those questions had not unduly occupied the attention of the House. In these circumstances, surely a little concession of the description now proposed to Irish public opinion was well merited, and he believed that it would be received with kindly feelings. The Chancellor of the Exchequer might think he would facilitate the obtaining of the Irish Estimates by the course which he was following; but if that course were to be persisted in, there was no resource for the Representatives from Ireland but to refuse Votes on Account in connection with all those questions in which they were interested, and thus compel the Government to bring forward their Estimates at an early period of the Session, in order that they might be properly discussed. At present, their discussion was little better than a farce.

MR. DILLWYN was strongly in favour of there being a more efficient and careful consideration of the Votes; but he could not support a proposal which would give his Irish Friends exceptional privileges.

MR. SERJANT SIMON said, he sympathized very much with the Irish Representatives in the complaints and grievances which they brought forward; but he could not support them when they sought exceptional privileges which he did not think they could properly ask for. He reminded them that the Rule of 1872, which was substantially the same as the proposal of the hon. and gallant Baronet, which the Government had accepted, was passed by a Parliament which had done more for Ireland than any other, and under no less a person than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, one of the best Friends that Ireland ever had. Under his Administration the Church of England and Ireland had been disestablished, and the Land Laws had been altered and brought into conformity with the wishes of the Irish people. It was during the Administration and in a Parliament which had accomplished these things, and many others, for the good of Ireland, that the Rule he was speaking of had been passed, and no Irish Member then, that he could call to mind, had objected to it. Under the circumstances, therefore, he appealed to the Irish Members to withdraw the Amendment.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, the Irish Members were not seeking any exceptional privileges. They simply asked to be allowed to retain those rights which English and Scotch Representatives had willingly given up at the instigation of the two front Benches on either side of the House. This was nothing more nor less than a combination between those two Benches. Those for whom he spoke had done their best to preserve the privileges of the House; but they were the trustees of a poor and weak nation. It was trampled on by the Government Session after Session. ["Oh!"] They were the trustees of a people who were insulted day after day. ["Oh!"] Why, in the course of the recent debate upon the Irish Franchise Question, one Representative—partly an official Member, for he was private Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant—had spoken in a manner which was grossly insulting to Ireland and her people. The Government refused to give Ireland equality of privileges; and its inhabitants were mocked year after year by being told in articles in English newspapers and speeches from the two front Benches in the House that they had the same privileges as England enjoyed. They were now going to take away from the Irish Members even the facility of making their complaints known. Did they suppose that Irish Members, who had been driven to move this Amendment against their will, would now withdraw it? They were perfectly mistaken if they thought they would do anything of the kind. He did not care how small the number might be in the division in favour of the Amendment—it would at least be a protest. He knew hon. Members who represented English and Scotch constituencies, who often voted with the Irish Members, but who would not do so as regarded this Amendment—and for why? Because they knew that in a weak moment they had given up their privileges; and they now saw the stubborn fight the Irish Members were making for the possession of theirs—therefore, the English and Scotch Members would not vote with them, because it would imply that they had not endeavoured sufficiently to keep their own privileges. The Irish Party would carry with them into the Lobby none but the Irish votes; yet it would be a protest which would go farther and would remain on record as a proof or test that they had done what they could to help the English Members to retain their privileges, and that the English Members did not support them when they wanted to retain theirs. Let that fact be known to the country, and it would be known in history; though he ventured to say that this Rule would not remain many years unaltered, because it would be found to trench too much on the privileges of the Members who would form the new Parliament.

Question,

“That the words ‘unless an Amendment be moved relating to the Estimates proposed to be taken in Supply, on first going into Committee on the Army, Navy, and Civil Services respectively,’ be added to the First Resolution,”

—put, and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, proposed,

“That, whenever the Committee of Supply appointed for the consideration of the ordinary Army, Navy, and Civil Service Estimates stands as the first Order of the Day on a Monday, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any Question, unless an Amendment be moved or Question raised relating to the Estimates proposed to be taken in Supply on first going into Committee on the Army, Navy, and Civil Services respectively.”

MR. PARNELL moved to amend the Resolution, by adding the words—

“And unless Notice has been given of an Amendment to be offered to the Question calling attention to the grievance arising out of the conduct of the Government or the administration of the Laws.”

All he wanted was to retain the ancient privilege of calling attention to grievances, and in drawing his Amendment he had carefully followed the words used by Sir Erskine May in his book on Parliamentary practice.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Question, to add the words “unless Notice has been given of an Amendment to be offered to the Question calling attention to any grievance arising out of the conduct of the Government or the administration of the Laws.”—(Mr. Parnell.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he did not think the House would accept the proposal of the hon. Member, inasmuch as it could only have the effect of introducing great confusion into the conduct of Business as to what was and was not admissible in the way of Amendment to the Motion to go into Committee of Supply. If the Resolution as it was drawn were adopted, there would remain abundant opportunities for calling attention to any grievances which might be alleged to have resulted from mismanagement on the part of the Government, and those opportunities were made conspicuous by the action of hon. Members on the other side.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, he had in previous divisions voted in the minority, but on the present occasion he should support Her Majesty's Government; because he regarded the Amendment before the House as an attempt to re-open a question which he thought had been compromised. It might be said that every grievance worthy of being made the subject of an Amendment on going into Committee of Supply was directly or indirectly a grievance arising out of the conduct of the Government, or the administration of the law. The proposed Amendment, therefore, simply raised in another form the question already decided by the House.

MR. O'DONNELL denied that every Amendment which was moved on the Motion to go into Committee of Supply was necessarily a question calling attention to a grievance arising out of the conduct of the Government or the administration of the laws; and it was not a good omen that the Members of the Liberal Party, such as the one who had just spoken, should support the Government in their policy of gagging and despotism. Not only the liberties of the Irish people, but those of the English people, were being sacrificed; and he repeated that it was a curious thing to see that this policy was supported by Members of the Liberal Party, who desired to succeed the present Party in the reins of power.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, that if the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Beaumaris (Mr. Morgan Lloyd) were really a sound one, he should be inclined to appeal to his hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) not to press the Amendment.

MR. O'CLERY remarked that he would give his hearty support to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Meath, because it involved, he thought, a question of great importance to Irish Members, who represented a country where it could not be said that the laws were administered as fairly and equitably as in England. It was, unfortunately, the case that in too many instances legal appointments in that country were bestowed as a reward for services to a particular Party. That principle had been extended even to the Bench; and there was a time when men who had served their Party in that House at the expense of their own honour and conscience were actually raised to the Irish Bench. English Members might be proud that the Judicial Bench in this country had never been disgraced in that way. There had been many offices in Ireland which had been filled up by persons whose sole claims consisted of services, sometimes of a doubtful character, which they had rendered to their Party; and therefore he maintained that the Amendment of his hon. Friend was worthy of consideration, when they took into account the position which Ireland held in that respect. By the Constitution, Ireland was allowed to be represented in that House; and yet they were about to deny to her Representatives the right of criticizing the action of the men whom the Government sent, against their wish, to administer justice in that country. He thought that his hon. Friend deserved the thanks of every liberty-loving man in that House for bringing forward this Amendment; and he sincerely hoped that a good many Members on both sides would be found to support it. He had not taken much part in these discussions; but he must say that, in his humble judgment, the best of the argument had been entirely on the side of the men who had striven to protect the House with its traditions of 600 years of freedom, and the defence of public right against the attempt of a Minister, however powerful, to force his will upon it. It was still not too late to say to the Minister that if he had any regard for the honour of the institutions which Ministers were so much in the habit of extolling at the Mansion House and elsewhere, he would, at any rate, accede to the Amendment, if he could not altogether abandon the Resolution.

MR. BIGGAR observed that the Amendment raised a very different point to that which usually arose out of Motions moved as Amendments to the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair. The laws in Ireland were administered by persons who received no salaries, and to whom no money was voted directly or indirectly; so that, in reality, there would be no opportunity during the progress of Votes through Committee whereby to impugn their conduct, should it be thought necessary. Really, in many cases, administration of the law was of the most partial character, and the instances in which magistrates misconducted themselves were by no means rare. Therefore, they ought to have an opportunity, as the occasion arose, of discussing the conduct of the great unpaid. In the case of the Judges it was altogether different, because they could move to reduce their salaries, and perhaps it might become necessary to do so. Some of their Judges administered the law in a manner which made it a burlesque. He had been told by a gentleman connected with the Profession that one of the Judges now on the Bench was thoroughly incapable of trying criminal cases, because his inviolable custom was to go for a conviction. What, then, could they expect from the great unpaid, who, in many cases, were thoroughly ignorant of their duties, and were in all cases greatly prejudiced? The Government would do well, therefore, to agree to the Amendment, and thus give an opportunity to hon. Members to raise questions as to the administration of the laws in a Constitutional manner.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 47; Noes 139: Majority 92.—(Div. List, No. 23.)

Main Question, as amended, again proposed.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER moved an Amendment to the effect that on Fridays Notices of Motion should have precedence of Orders of the Day.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Question, to add the words "and on Fridays Notices of Motion shall have precedence of Orders of the Day."—(Mr. O'Connor Power.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. MONK thought the Amendment was one deserving of the attention of the Government. The Government would lose nothing by accepting it, and they would, further, confer a fair and reasonable boon upon Members on Fridays.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON supported the Amendment.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE pointed out the inconvenience to private Members which arose on Fridays, when Supply was the first Order of the Day, from their being frequently unable to bring their Motions to the test of a Division, owing to the fact that any of the preceding Motions happened to have been negatived. He did not, however, know whether the present Amendment would furnish the best means of obviating that inconvenience.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE disapproved of the Amendment. There had been quite enough in the way of innovation in the conduct of the Business of the House, and in this case matters might with advantage be left as they were. The present Rule imported something of elasticity into their forms, and gave an opening for discussions on topics worthy of consideration, but not calling for cut-and-dry Resolutions. It would be a clear loss to the facile powers of the House if this free and easy method were abolished, and a hard-and-fast compulsion of Divisions on all days substituted.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, without entering into the merits of the question, pointed out that it would be difficult, if not impossible, for the Government to make the proposed alteration. He hoped the Amendment would not be pressed, as he apprehended it would not be, in order to attempt to repeal, as it were by a side wind, a Standing Order of the House in accordance with which Supply was set down on the Notice Paper as the first Business on Fridays.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the system of "calling attention" was almost unheard of when he first entered Parliament. It was a practice which had the effect of debarring the House from expressing an opinion, and, at the same time, enabled individual Members tyrannically to occupy the attention of the House.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he quite agreed with what had been said as to the undesirable practice of invariably negativing the first Motion for going into Supply. He did not believe it was of any advantage to the Government; because the effect was that many of the Motions that remained were put down for some other day. He did not know whether any practical remedy could be adopted against this practice; but it was one which, no doubt, it would be well to put a stop to. With regard to the Amendment that had been moved, there was one suggestion he wished to make for the consideration of Members who delighted to call themselves independent. They ought to recollect that if Friday were converted from an Order Day into a Notice Day, the probability of a "Count-out" on Friday would be increased. At present, it was very much to the interest of the Government to keep a House on Friday; but this would no longer be the case if Friday were converted into a Notice Day. The gain, if any, which the independent Members would obtain would be, to a considerable extent, neutralized by the great risk of losing the evening altogether.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD suggested that the Rules of the House might be altered so far as to allow a Division on every Motion brought forward as an Amendment to the Motion that the Speaker should leave the Chair.

MR. PARNELL said, he was very much disappointed with the reply of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman had promised last year to give private Members compensation by making Friday a Motion night instead of a Supply night. Now he seemed to think that private Members ought to have no compensation at all for their loss in giving up Mondays.

MR. ERRINGTON and MR. BIGGAR supported the Amendment.

MR. ANDERSON suggested that, instead of the Speaker putting the Question in a form which, if affirmed, prevented any Amendment, subsequent to the first being voted upon, on a Supply night, he might put it, "That the Amendment be affirmed," and this would allow of every subsequent one being voted upon. The Government might also revert to the old practice of keeping a House on Fridays.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 50; Noes 139: Majority 89.—(Div. List, No. 24.)

Main Question, as amended, again proposed.

MR. BIGGAR said, the next Amendment stood on the Paper in the name of his hon. Friend the Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell); but as he was prevented from moving it by the Rules of debate, he had undertaken to move it for him. It was to add, at the end of the amended Resolution—

"Provided always, That when Notice of a Motion has been given which, but for this Rule, would have been moved on a Monday, the next succeeding Committee of Ways and Means shall be a first Order of the Day, and Notices applicable on going into Committee of Supply on Monday shall be transferred to going into Committee on Ways and Means."

He expected the Government would accept the Amendment, for the reason that originally Ways and Means was included in Supply; but during the early stages of the discussion on this question the Government agreed to withdraw Ways and Means from the operation of the Rule. The object of the Amendment was to give an opportunity of discussing general questions on the Motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means. If the Government assented to this principle it could only be reasonable to make Ways and Means the first Order, as otherwise these questions might be brought on at a very late hour.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Question, to add the words "Provided always, That when Notice of a Motion has been given which, but for this Rule, would have been moved on a Monday, the next succeeding Committee of Ways and Means shall be a first Order of the Day, and Notices applicable on going into Committee of Supply on Monday shall be transferred to going into Committee on Ways and Means."—(Mr. Biggar.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the hon. Member could not have expected the Amendment to be accepted by the Government. According to it, the next succeeding Committee of Ways and Means would be a Wednesday, for it was a Standing Order of the House that Ways and Means should always be on the Paper on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays. Therefore, the next day for the Committee would be Wednesday. The hon. Member next proposed that the Committee on that day should have precedence. But by the Rules of the House Bills of private Members had precedence on Wednesdays. Therefore, this proposal would create considerable confusion. He did not himself see what object would be gained by the Amendment; because if any hon. Member failed to bring on his Motion on Committee of Supply he could himself postpone it to the next occasion of Ways and Means, with the exception, of course, that he could not take precedence of those hon. Members who had already put their Motions. They would only be encumbering themselves by passing this Resolution.

MR. O'DONNELL said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had very clearly and lucidly shown that the concession of the Committee of Ways and Means, on which he laid so much stress last week, did not amount to anything at all. He had asked the House to give the Government a great deal of credit for their concessions with regard to the Committee of Ways and Means; but as it was now admitted that by the present Standing Orders the Committee was only fixed for certain days, it was quite clear that to call attention to grievances previously would be very little use. It followed conclusively that the Government had made a concession which was, in fact, no concession whatever; and he strongly suspected that several other so-called concessions should be cast under the same head.

MR. BIGGAR said, by the advice of his hon. Friend the Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) he would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Resolved, That, whenever the Committee of Supply appointed for the consideration of the ordinary Army, Navy, and Civil Service Estimates stands as the first Order of the Day on a Monday, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any question, unless an Amendment be moved or Question raised relating to the Estimates proposed to be taken in Supply on first going into Committee on the Army, Navy, and Civil Services respectively.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there were other Resolutions on the Paper, but it would be obviously impossible to move them at that hour. He should propose, therefore, that they stand over till Thursday week. On Thursday his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War would introduce the Mutiny Bill; and he hoped on that day to take Supply as the first Order for the purpose of taking some Supplementary Estimates, which would be presented next day—Tuesday—for the purpose of providing for the Exchequer Bonds, shortly falling due. He hoped to lay the Estimates on the Table to-night (Tuesday), to have them in the hands of Members on Wednesday, and to go into Committee of Supply on Thursday.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON supposed that the Orders of the Day would be postponed after Supply had been taken till the Mutiny Bill had been brought in.

MAJOR NOLAN asked whether the Government could bring on the Mutiny Bill in that way before the Army Estimates had been submitted?

COLONEL STANLEY said, it was perfectly competent for the Government to do this. The Mutiny Bill of this year would consist of two parts—one that which he proposed to introduce on Thursday, and the other the annual Bill, which gave the actual control over the Force.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he had always understood that the Mutiny Bill could not be introduced till after the Army Estimates had been voted. Was this a change that the Government was introducing; and, if so, what authority had they for making it?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the Secretary of State for War proposed to introduce on Thursday what was, in fact, an Army Discipline Bill; and this, when passed, would be a permanent Act. He would also introduce afterwards a short Mutiny Bill, which would have to be passed year by year, and which undoubtedly could not be introduced until the Army Estimates had been brought in.

ASSIZES BILL—[BILL 83.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, it gave the Government power by an Order in Council to group certain counties and boroughs together for the purpose of the Spring Assizes, as it would be in the knowledge of some hon. Members had already been done in the case of the Winter Assizes. The Spring Assizes would shortly commence; and it was very important, therefore, that this Bill should be at once passed. Its object was to effect an economy of time and labour; and therefore he hoped the House would not object to read it a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Matthew Ridley.)

MR. PARNELL thought more time should have been given for considering the bearing of this important measure. Did it apply to Ireland? ["No!"] If it did not, his objections to it were, to a certain extent, removed; but, at the same time, he doubted whether it was desirable to have additional Assizes. The Bill of last year had not worked particularly well. In any case, however, he thought the practice of bringing in Bills of that importance at so late an hour was to be deprecated.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the Assizes began on the 22nd of next month; and unless this Bill passed it would be necessary for the Judges to go to each town on the Circuit, to the great expense of the country, the jurors, and everybody else. The Bill was simply to enable small counties to be grouped together, in order to save expense at the Spring Assizes.

MR. COURTNEY said, he wished to ask a Question on a point of Order. He understood the hon. Member for Cumberland had given Notice of an Amendment to the Bill?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: He has withdrawn it.

MR. WADDY asked the House whether it was a right and proper thing to ask them to pass a Bill which was not printed? [MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Oh, yes, it is.] He asked for the Bill within the last ten minutes at the Office, and was told that he could not have one, as the Bill was not printed. [MR. ASSHETON CROSS: It was circulated last Saturday.] As a matter of fact, he had asked for it within the last ten minutes, and told that he could not have it.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, the Bill appeared to him to be one of a merely temporary nature. There was a difficulty in regard to the Spring Assizes which could only be got over by the passage of a short Act of this kind. He should like to ask whether this Bill was to be considered as finally settling the question of the arrangement of the Assizes, or whether, even supposing the Bill passed, the House might not have an opportunity hereafter of discussing the whole question?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS hoped the House would allow him to explain that this Bill was not at all meant as a settlement of the question. The House would have another opportunity of fully discussing the whole matter.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

HABITUAL DRUNKARDS [SALARIES, STAMP DUTY, &c.].

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of the Salaries, Remuneration, Allowances, and Expenses of the Inspector and Assistant Inspector of Retreats; also of imposing a Stamp Duty on Licences for the admission of Patients into Retreats, and for the renewal of such Licences, which may become payable under the provisions of any Act of the present Session to facilitate the control and cure of Habitual Drunkards.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

HABITUAL DRUNKARDS BILL.

(Dr. Cameron, Mr. Clare Read, Mr. Ashley, Sir Henry Jackson, Mr. Edward Jenkins, Mr. William Holms, Mr. O'Shaughnessy.)

[BILL 47.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Dr. Cameron.)

MR. DILLWYN said, he very much disliked the principle of the Bill, and he opposed the second reading; but as the feeling of the House was evidently very much in favour of the measure, and there was a great disposition to pass it, he would not put the House to the trouble of dividing. Since then he had communicated with his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), and that Gentleman had accepted some suggestions he had made, which seemed to him to get rid of the dangers to the liberty of the subject. He would not, therefore, now be under the necessity of further opposing the Bill, and he should offer no objection to the Speaker leaving the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2 (Commencement of Act).

MR. DILLWYN said, the object of the Amendment of which he had given Notice was to prevent the Bill being made absolute, so far as regarded persons who had a pecuniary interest in retaining persons under their charge. In this respect the Bill ought to be limited, and to be treated merely as an experiment. He, therefore, proposed that the Act should only extend to the year 1886, by adding at the end of the clause—

"And in the case of retreats kept by private persons shall cease and determine on the first day of January one thousand eight hundred and eighty six."

Amendment moved, at end of Clause to add—

"And in the case of retreats kept by private persons shall cease and determine on the first day of January one thousand eight hundred and eighty six."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

DR. CAMERON said, he had no objection to the Amendment which only affected retreats kept by private persons for their own profit. If it were passed, however, it would be necessary further on to introduce a definition into the Bill exempting from the operation of this Amendment institutions maintained by private charity, which were not open to the objection raised by the hon. Member for Swansea.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 (Interpretation) agreed to.

Clause 4 (Incorporation of Schedules with Forms and Rules therein) agreed to.

Clause 5 (Local authority and clerk to local authority) agreed to.

Retreats.

Clause 6 (Establishment of retreats) agreed to.

Clause 7 (Power of local authority to transfer licence) agreed to.

Clause 8 (Removal of habitual drunkard from unfit habitation. Notice of such removal).

DR. CAMERON moved, in page 3, line 30, after "Act," to insert "or otherwise unsuitable for its purpose."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. DILLWYN moved, in page 3, line 31, after "Act," to insert "shall order the discharge from such retreat and." By the clause as it stood it was optional whether or not the inmates should be discharged. He proposed to make the clause compulsory; for he did not think people ought to be maintained in retreats of this character which had been declared to be unfit for their habitation.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 9 (Persons may be admitted to retreats on their own application).

MR. DILLWYN moved, in page 4, to leave out "the" at the beginning of line 9, and insert

"by a personal interview with the applicant unaccompanied by any other person he has satisfied himself that the said."

He desired in every case that the applicant should be personally free to act as he thought best; and that, therefore, he should see the magistrate unaccompanied by any other person.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 9, to leave out the word "the," and insert the words "by a personal interview with the applicant unaccompanied by any other person he has satisfied himself that the said."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'the' stand part of the Clause."

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, the wording of the Amendment was rather awkward, because it might be very desirable that the person going before a magistrate should be accompanied by someone.

MR. DILLWYN said, that was just the object he had in view. He did not want a man to go to the Justice in a state of drunkenness; but he wished him to go when he was sober, and knew what he was about. When a man really did not know what he was about, he ought not to be able to sign away his liberty in this manner.

DR. CAMERON thought the Amendment was not so objectionable as his hon. Friend (Mr. Mitchell Henry) thought. Under the clause as it stood the habitual drunkard would go before the Justice with his friends, and produce such evidence as was necessary to prove that the man was an habitual drunkard. Then, if the Amendment were added, the Justice would retire with the habitual drunkard, and convince himself, if necessary, that it was the habitual drunkard's own desire to have himself committed. In that way, the object of his hon. Friend, that the man's promise should not be unjustly obtained, would be attained.

An hon. MEMBER thought it might be left to the judgment of the Justice without instructing him to retire with this lady or gentleman, as the case might be, and examine them privately.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, the Amendment would be a most disagreeable one to enforce. The Justice might be an aged gentleman, and it would be very unpleasant for him to be required to go into a private room with an individual who came before him placarded, as it were, with the name of habitual drunkard, and who might be on the very verge of delirium tremens, and who, when he got him into the private room, might take it into his head to ill-treat him. He submitted that this was not an Amendment which would improve the Bill in any substantial degree, or would in any particular way protect the liberty of the subject; while it might place gentlemen who were intrusted with the administration of the law in a very painful and invidious position.

EARL PERCY said, the speech of the hon. Member who had just sat down seemed to him a strong argument for the Amendment. The Bill was not intended to affect people who were on the verge of delirium tremens, or to give a Justice of the Peace power to send such persons into retirement. The Bill really was intended for persons who were in the habit of getting intoxicated, and who, being perfectly conscious of their failing, were yet unable by the present law to sign away their liberty.

MR. DALRYMPLE said, the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), having been strongly opposed to the Bill in the first instance, was now desirous to make it as inoperative as possible. The object of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) had been to make terms with him; and he had therefore accepted, to a considerable extent, the Amendments of the hon. Member. Of course, one object of the Bill was to induce persons voluntarily to enter these retreats; but, at the same time, he ventured to think there might be cases in which a certain amount of pressure, not of an unfriendly kind, and not in the nature of compulsion, should be brought to bear to induce these drunkards to enter a retreat, and where this was so it would be unnecessary that they should go before the Justice, accompanied by their friends. The Amendment would defeat the benevolent design of the Bill; and he could not but think that the hon. Member for Glasgow, in his desire to propitiate the hon. Member for Swansea, had accepted this Amendment too readily, and had fallen into a trap. He did not suppose for a moment the Amendment would be withdrawn in consequence of what he said; but he did think that it would do harm in the very cases with which the Bill was especially designed to deal.

MR. DILLWYN said, a man in a state of half-maudlin repentance might be induced and wheedled into going before a magistrate, not liking to say no to his friends, although all the time he did not really wish it; and therefore he thought the Amendment more important than other hon. Members apparently considered it to be. He was sure that the hon. Members did not wish a man to go into a retreat against his own inclinations; and he only wished to make sure that nobody went in except of their own free will.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY said, it was by no means certain that the Amendment would have the effect intended by the hon. Member for Swansea, and the presence of a third person might act as a check on the Justice signing too hastily. On the other hand, it might very well be that a person applying for an order to enter one of these retreats might be brusque, offensive, or even a little alarming, in his demeanour, and the magistrate might consider that quite sufficient proof, and sign the warrant off straight at once.

COLONEL MAKINS said, the whole object of the Bill was to give habitual drunkards an opportunity of retrieving their character; and it did not much matter whether, when they applied to enter a retreat, they were in a half-maudlin state or not. If the man was in that state the magistrate could decline, under the provisions of the Act, to exercise his functions; while, on the other hand, if the man was sufficiently himself to sign away his own freedom, that would only be quite carrying out the object of the Act.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 43; Noes 35: Majority 8.—(Div. List, No. 26.)

Clause agreed to.

Clause 10 (Licensee of retreats to send notice of admission) agreed to.

Clause 11 (Power of discharge).

DR. CAMERON moved, in page 4, line 24, after "proprietor," to insert "licensee." The Amendment was purely a verbal one.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. DILLWYN moved, in the same line, after "retreat," to insert—

"Or of that of such person, a clear week's notice having been given by him or her to the licensee of the retreat."

He thought an habitual drunkard, when he was shut up in one of these places, ought to have the power of getting out again; and he therefore proposed to place in his hands the same power of applying to a Justice of the Peace that the Bill gave to the licensee. Of course, the applicant would have to satisfy himself that the case was made out, and then he would have power to make an order of release.

MR. WHITWELL thought there ought to be an addition to the clause, so as to deal with the case of a licensee who had received money for a patient. There ought to be a provision that he should not go out at once, but should remain for a certain time.

EARL PERCY said, the hon. Member really ought not to press his Amendment. If he entertained such views, he ought to have moved the rejection of the Bill. The object of the Bill was to place persons in a position where they could not change their minds, and get out of one of these retreats as soon as they had a wish to do so. The clause directly enabled them to do that. It was true the patient must give a week's notice. He spoke under the correction of persons who knew more of these diseases than he did, when he said that this would make very little difference. On the other hand, there was no limit to the trouble which a patient might give. He might apply to one Justice after another, going in turn to all the Justices on the Bench, until he found one who took a crotchety view of this question, and let him out. He appreciated most fully the desire of the hon. Gentleman to protect the liberty of the subject, and he voted with him in his last Amendment; but this proposal would really defeat the whole object of the Bill.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he sat on the Committee which inquired into this question three years ago, and he quite agreed with the noble Lord that the Amendment which had been proposed would overthrow the Bill. Habitual drunkards were persons who were habitually getting drunk and being sorry for it afterwards—persons whose infirmity of mind made it necessary to legislate for them. They were, in fact, in a manner, insane persons, having sober and lucid moments. In those sober and lucid moments they formed good resolutions, which they were not able to carry out, and so relapsed again into drunkenness. The object of the Bill was that when they had these favourable impulses, after a debauch of drunkenness, they should be enabled to place themselves under control in one of these retreats for a certain length of time. The habitual drunkard could not expect to be cured by one incarceration. He might go in for two or three months, and be discharged, and relapse again. That would almost certainly happen, because all experience showed that an habitual drunkard was only cured by a long period of incarceration in a retreat. Next time, then, the patient would agree to go there for eight or nine months, or perhaps a year, and then he would be radically cured. But under this Amendment, by the time his system had got rid of all the alcohol it contained, and the patient was beginning to get into sound health, he would wish to be out again; and the consequence would be that he would be able of his own desire to remove himself from that remedial legislation which it was the very object of this Bill to provide. Anybody under the Bill would be able to place himself in one of these retreats for a period in no case longer than 12 months, and certainly 12 months was a very short time taken out of the life of a man in which to cure him thoroughly of so terrible a disease as that of habitual drunkenness, a disease, too, which brought so many evils upon society.

cretary to the Lord Lieutenant, who occasionally strolled into the House to see how the amusement was progressing. The Irish Members had not the opportunities which were enjoyed by English and Scotch Representatives of urging their grievances, in connection with the various Departments, upon the attention of the Legislature, and they were few in number in a House consisting of 650 Gentlemen. They were thus placed at a disadvantage from the start in balloting for a place on going into Committee of Supply; and that disadvantage would be increased one hundredfold by the action of the Resolution of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if it were to be adopted without the Amendment which was now urged. That Amendment appeared to him to be a very small and reasonable proposition. The Leader of the House knew perfectly well that the Irish Members had in no instance misused the privileges which they now possessed; that the questions which they had brought forward had been few in number; and that those questions had not unduly occupied the attention of the House. In these circumstances, surely a little concession of the description now proposed to Irish public opinion was well merited, and he believed that it would be received with kindly feelings. The Chancellor of the Exchequer might think he would facilitate the obtaining of the Irish Estimates by the course which he was following; but if that course were to be persisted in, there was no resource for the Representatives from Ireland but to refuse Votes on Account in connection with all those questions in which they were interested, and thus compel the Government to bring forward their Estimates at an early period of the Session, in order that they might be properly discussed. At present, their discussion was little better than a farce.

MR. DILLWYN was strongly in favour of there being a more efficient and careful consideration of the Votes; but he could not support a proposal which would give his Irish Friends exceptional privileges.

MR. SERJANT SIMON said, he sympathized very much with the Irish Representatives in the complaints and grievances which they brought forward; but he could not support them when they sought exceptional privileges which he did not think they could properly ask for. He reminded them that the Rule of 1872, which was substantially the same as the proposal of the hon. and gallant Baronet, which the Government had accepted, was passed by a Parliament which had done more for Ireland than any other, and under no less a person than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, one of the best Friends that Ireland ever had. Under his Administration the Church of England and Ireland had been disestablished, and the Land Laws had been altered and brought into conformity with the wishes of the Irish people. It was during the Administration and in a Parliament which had accomplished these things, and many others, for the good of Ireland, that the Rule he was speaking of had been passed, and no Irish Member then, that he could call to mind, had objected to it. Under the circumstances, therefore, he appealed to the Irish Members to withdraw the Amendment.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, the Irish Members were not seeking any exceptional privileges. They simply asked to be allowed to retain those rights which English and Scotch Representatives had willingly given up at the instigation of the two front Benches on either side of the House. This was nothing more nor less than a combination between those two Benches. Those for whom he spoke had done their best to preserve the privileges of the House; but they were the trustees of a poor and weak nation. It was trampled on by the Government Session after Session. ["Oh!"] They were the trustees of a people who were insulted day after day. ["Oh!"] Why, in the course of the recent debate upon the Irish Franchise Question, one Representative—partly an official Member, for he was private Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant—had spoken in a manner which was grossly insulting to Ireland and her people. The Government refused to give Ireland equality of privileges; and its inhabitants were mocked year after year by being told in articles in English newspapers and speeches from the two front Benches in the House that they had the same privileges as England enjoyed. They were now going to take away from the Irish Members even the facility of making their complaints known. Did they suppose that Irish Members, who had been driven to move this Amendment against their will, would now withdraw it? They were perfectly mistaken if they thought they would do anything of the kind. He did not care how small the number might be in the division in favour of the Amendment—it would at least be a protest. He knew hon. Members who represented English and Scotch constituencies, who often voted with the Irish Members, but who would not do so as regarded this Amendment—and for why? Because they knew that in a weak moment they had given up their privileges; and they now saw the stubborn fight the Irish Members were making for the possession of theirs—therefore, the English and Scotch Members would not vote with them, because it would imply that they had not endeavoured sufficiently to keep their own privileges. The Irish Party would carry with them into the Lobby none but the Irish votes; yet it would be a protest which would go farther and would remain on record as a proof or test that they had done what they could to help the English Members to retain their privileges, and that the English Members did not support them when they wanted to retain theirs. Let that fact be known to the country, and it would be known in history; though he ventured to say that this Rule would not remain many years unaltered, because it would be found to trench too much on the privileges of the Members who would form the new Parliament.

Question,

“That the words ‘unless an Amendment be moved relating to the Estimates proposed to be taken in Supply, on first going into Committee on the Army, Navy, and Civil Services respectively,’ be added to the First Resolution,”

—put, and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, proposed,

“That, whenever the Committee of Supply appointed for the consideration of the ordinary Army, Navy, and Civil Service Estimates stands as the first Order of the Day on a Monday, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any Question, unless an Amendment be moved or Question raised relating to the Estimates proposed to be taken in Supply on first going into Committee on the Army, Navy, and Civil Services respectively.”

MR. PARNELL moved to amend the Resolution, by adding the words—

“And unless Notice has been given of an Amendment to be offered to the Question calling attention to the grievance arising out of the conduct of the Government or the administration of the Laws.”

All he wanted was to retain the ancient privilege of calling attention to grievances, and in drawing his Amendment he had carefully followed the words used by Sir Erskine May in his book on Parliamentary practice.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Question, to add the words “unless Notice has been given of an Amendment to be offered to the Question calling attention to any grievance arising out of the conduct of the Government or the administration of the Laws.”—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he did not think the House would accept the proposal of the hon. Member, inasmuch as it could only have the effect of introducing great confusion into the conduct of Business as to what was and was not admissible in the way of Amendment to the Motion to go into Committee of Supply. If the Resolution as it was drawn were adopted, there would remain abundant opportunities for calling attention to any grievances which might be alleged to have resulted from mismanagement on the part of the Government, and those opportunities were made conspicuous by the action of hon. Members on the other side.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, he had in previous divisions voted in the minority, but on the present occasion he should support Her Majesty's Government; because he regarded the Amendment before the House as an attempt to re-open a question which he thought had been compromised. It might be said that every grievance worthy of being made the subject of an Amendment on going into Committee of Supply was directly or indirectly a grievance arising out of the conduct of the Government, or the administration of the law. The proposed Amendment, therefore, simply raised in another form the question already decided by the House.

MR. O'DONNELL denied that every Amendment which was moved on the Motion to go into Committee of Supply

His object simply was that copies of the Reports sent to the Home Secretary should also be sent to the clerk of the local authority, in order that they might know what was going on in the district under their jurisdiction.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 15 (Rules as to visitation of retreats) agreed to.

Clause 17 (Permission that person detained may reside out of retreat).

MR. DILLWYN said, he would move, as suggested by his hon. Friend the Under Secretary, in page 6, line 3, after "drunkard" to insert—

"Or at the request of such person, a clear week's notice having been given by him or her to the licensee of the retreat, may."

He would only say, in answer to what had fallen from his hon. Friends, that of course the magistrate would use his discretion, and would not grant a licence without due inquiry. Something had been said of the American system; but he happened to have some American papers sent him the other day, in which it was said that these retreats had broken down in that country, and been an entire failure.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 3, after the word "drunkard," to insert the words "or at the request of such person, a clear week's notice having been given by him or her to the licensee of the retreat may."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, if his hon. Friend had read all that the American newspapers had said about these retreats, he would have learned that one great reason why they had failed was because the period of detention was not long enough. Another point brought out very strongly by a very pains-taking and patient Committee, which sat on this subject upstairs three years ago, was that to be effectual the confinement of the patient must be for a considerable period of time, or it was perfectly useless. The Committee must remember that this Bill was not intended for persons who occasionally got drunk, but for persons who were almost insane, who were quite unable to control themselves, who dissipated their property, and brought untold misery on their families by their craving for drink, and yet who were not mad enough to be called insane. So far from this power of leaving the retreat being any good to such people, it would be a great evil inflicted upon them.

EARL PERCY said, the Amendment did not read, for it spoke of "such person" although there was no "person" previously mentioned in the clause. As to the principle of it, he could only point out, as he had done before, that if this power of appealing to magistrates were given, a man would be certain to find some Justice who would give the required licence. That would result in removing the control which it was the object of the Bill to confer. As to what was said about America, the principle of the Bill had already been discussed, and these points were then satisfactorily answered. In any case, that objection struck at the Bill itself, and should have been raised on the second reading.

MR. DALRYMPLE said, the hon. Member for Swansea appeared to claim the support of his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department for his Amendment, but he (Mr. Dalrymple) understood that the Under Secretary did not do more than suggest that this was a suitable place to propose the Amendment; and he certainly did not understand him to say he would support it. The great point was to get the patient into one of these retreats, and not to let him be able to leave it prematurely, which would do him the greatest possible harm. He certainly should oppose the Amendment, and would divide upon it, even if no one else would do so.

MR. WADDY said, the Amendment would place the Justice of the Peace in a very great difficulty. A man might be sufficiently sober to be quite fit apparently to go out; and yet his craving for liquor at that very time might make that exactly the position in which he ought not to be.

MR. ANDERSON said, the keeper of the retreat was the man most interested were in all cases greatly prejudiced? The Government would do well, therefore, to agree to the Amendment, and thus give an opportunity to hon. Members to raise questions as to the administration of the laws in a Constitutional manner.

The House divided:—Ayes 47; Noes 139: Majority 92.—(Div. List, No. 23.)

Main Question, as amended, again proposed.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER moved an Amendment to the effect that on Fridays Notices of Motion should have precedence of Orders of the Day.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Question, to add the words "and on Fridays Notices of Motion shall have precedence of Orders of the Day."—(Mr. O'Connor Power.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. MONK thought the Amendment was one deserving of the attention of the Government. The Government would lose nothing by accepting it, and they would, further, confer a fair and reasonable boon upon Members on Fridays.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON supported the Amendment.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE pointed out the inconvenience to private Members which arose on Fridays, when Supply was the first Order of the Day, from their being frequently unable to bring their Motions to the test of a Division, owing to the fact that any of the preceding Motions happened to have been negatived. He did not, however, know whether the present Amendment would furnish the best means of obviating that inconvenience.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE disapproved of the Amendment. There had been quite enough in the way of innovation in the conduct of the Business of the House, and in this case matters might with advantage be left as they were. The present Rule imported something of elasticity into their forms, and gave an opening for discussions on topics worthy of consideration, but not calling for cut-and-dry Resolutions. It would be a clear loss to the facile powers of the House if this free and easy method were abolished, and a hard-and-fast compulsion of Divisions on all days substituted.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, without entering into the merits of the question, pointed out that it would be difficult, if not impossible, for the Government to make the proposed alteration. He hoped the Amendment would not be pressed, as he apprehended it would not be, in order to attempt to repeal, as it were by a side wind, a Standing Order of the House in accordance with which Supply was set down on the Notice Paper as the first Business on Fridays.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the system of "calling attention" was almost unheard of when he first entered Parliament. It was a practice which had the effect of debarring the House from expressing an opinion, and, at the same time, enabled individual Members tyrannically to occupy the attention of the House.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he quite agreed with what had been said as to the undesirable practice of invariably negativing the first Motion for going into Supply. He did not believe it was of any advantage to the Government; because the effect was that many of the Motions that remained were put down for some other day. He did not know whether any practical remedy could be adopted against this practice; but it was one which, no doubt, it would be well to put a stop to. With regard to the Amendment that had been moved, there was one suggestion he wished to make for the consideration of Members who delighted to call themselves independent. They ought to recollect that if Friday were converted from an Order Day into a Notice Day, the probability of a "Count-out" on Friday would be increased. At present, it was very much to the interest of the Government to keep a House on Friday; but this would no longer be the case if Friday were converted into a Notice Day. The gain, if any, which the independent Members would obtain would be, to a considerable extent, neutralized by the great risk of losing the evening altogether.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD suggested that the Rules of the House might be altered so far as to allow a Division on every Motion brought forward as an

the drugs, and therefore there was no want of the proper qualification. In the case of sleeplessness arising from the want of drink there was a very considerable difference of opinion among medical men as to the use of narcotics and stimulants, and it was certainly not the intention that unqualified and uneducated licensees should treat such cases.

MR. HERSCHELL said, as to bringing stimulants on to the premises, authority might be intrusted either to the licensee or the medical officer. He would suggest that the words should run thus—

“Without the authority of the licensee or the medical officer brings into any retreat or without the authority of the medical officer of the retreat, except in case of urgent necessity gives or supplies,” &c.

In case of urgent necessity there would be power to do it; while, in the case of general treatment, it would only be fair to require the authority of the medical officer. That would meet the objection.

DR. CAMERON moved, in page 7, line 9, after “sedative” to insert “narcotic.”

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 25 (Escape from retreat).

MR. DILLWYN said, he should move an Amendment here, undeterred by the warning of his hon. and gallant Friend (Major Nolan), and he did hope the Home Office would support him a little more strongly. The clause dealt with the re-capture of escaped habitual drunkards, and he thought it would give rise to great abuse of the law. Where a man escaped he ought not to be liable to re-capture, at any rate by the servants of the retreat; but a proper officer should be employed. He entirely objected to Jack, Tom, or Harry being intrusted with this power, and he would move, in line 26, to leave out “by any officer, attendant, servant, or other person employed in or about such retreat.”

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, nothing could be more dangerous than to intrust the liberty of any man at large to the mere servant of any licensee in the general words of the clause. It was not done in the case of a lunatic asylum, so far as he was aware, though there were stronger reasons there for the detention and recovery of a man who had escaped. There was no limitation to the power of the clause, and a man who had been at liberty a fortnight or more might be taken back to the asylum. The framer of the Bill ought to consider the whole structure of the clause. He did not know exactly what a peace officer meant. It meant one thing in England, and another in Scotland. He had also the greatest reluctance to intrust to any man—peace officer, constable, or anyone else—the right of interfering with the liberty of the subject, without a warrant at his back. If he had a warrant, it should either come from the licensee, or some person responsible for his agent. He heartily supported the Amendment.

DR. CAMERON thought the suggestion a good one; but pointed out that the licence was intended to give greater freedom to the patients, and prevent the necessity for always keeping them within four walls.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, the clause was far too wide. If a peace officer had a warrant they would know whence he got his right to act; but to give him the power to act without a warrant seemed to him very dangerous, and contrary to all precedent. He would move to substitute the word “by” for the word “without” in page 7, line 28.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY thought it would be better to postpone the whole clause, or allow the Law Officers of the Crown to confer with the Home Office and the hon. Member for Glasgow.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, his hon. and learned Friend and Colleague had undertaken to see the clause was properly settled; but they certainly ought not to pass it as it stood, and it should be amended as suggested.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. DALRYMPLE said, it was useless to oppose an Amendment of the clause supported as it was; but it had entirely changed the character of the clause. It might not be right to give to

would be very little use. It followed conclusively that the Government had made a concession which was, in fact, no concession whatever; and he strongly suspected that several other so-called concessions should be cast under the same head.

MR. BIGGAR said, by the advice of his hon. Friend the Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) he would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Resolved, That, whenever the Committee of Supply appointed for the consideration of the ordinary Army, Navy, and Civil Service Estimates stands as the first Order of the Day on a Monday, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any question, unless an Amendment be moved or Question raised relating to the Estimates proposed to be taken in Supply on first going into Committee on the Army, Navy, and Civil Services respectively.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there were other Resolutions on the Paper, but it would be obviously impossible to move them at that hour. He should propose, therefore, that they stand over till Thursday week. On Thursday his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War would introduce the Mutiny Bill; and he hoped on that day to take Supply as the first Order for the purpose of taking some Supplementary Estimates, which would be presented next day—Tuesday—for the purpose of providing for the Exchequer Bonds, shortly falling due. He hoped to lay the Estimates on the Table to-night (Tuesday), to have them in the hands of Members on Wednesday, and to go into Committee of Supply on Thursday.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON supposed that the Orders of the Day would be postponed after Supply had been taken till the Mutiny Bill had been brought in.

MAJOR NOLAN asked whether the Government could bring on the Mutiny Bill in that way before the Army Estimates had been submitted?

COLONEL STANLEY said, it was perfectly competent for the Government to do this. The Mutiny Bill of this year would consist of two parts—one that which he proposed to introduce on Thursday, and the other the annual Bill, which gave the actual control over the Force.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he had always understood that the Mutiny Bill could not be introduced till after the Army Estimates had been voted. Was this a change that the Government was introducing; and, if so, what authority had they for making it?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the Secretary of State for War proposed to introduce on Thursday what was, in fact, an Army Discipline Bill; and this, when passed, would be a permanent Act. He would also introduce afterwards a short Mutiny Bill, which would have to be passed year by year, and which undoubtedly could not be introduced until the Army Estimates had been brought in.

ASSIZES BILL—[BILL 83.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, it gave the Government power by an Order in Council to group certain counties and boroughs together for the purpose of the Spring Assizes, as it would be in the knowledge of some hon. Members had already been done in the case of the Winter Assizes. The Spring Assizes would shortly commence; and it was very important, therefore, that this Bill should be at once passed. Its object was to effect an economy of time and labour; and therefore he hoped the House would not object to read it a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Matthew Ridley.)

MR. PARNELL thought more time should have been given for considering the bearing of this important measure. Did it apply to Ireland? ["No!"] If it did not, his objections to it were, to a certain extent, removed; but, at the well understand that he had the subject constantly before him. He had consultations with various persons qualified to judge of the question of medical education; and, in consequence, he had come to the conclusion to deal with the question last year. He accordingly introduced a measure in their Lordships' House. In that Bill, so far as England was concerned, the principle of a Conjoint Board was approved of; but as regarded Scotland and Ireland, the establishment of such a Board was allowed to be optional, instead of being made obligatory, or, in other words, the medical authorities were only to adopt the provisions of the Act if they should see fit. Having since then considered all the arguments which had been brought forward against the optional character of the Bill in that respect, he was of opinion that to leave the setting up of a Conjoint Board optional would not be consistent with reason. Therefore, in the Bill he should lay on the Table, the establishment of a Conjoint Board in each division of the Kingdom was made compulsory. Some of the most distinguished medical men in this country had manifested a desire for the establishment of a Conjoint Board, and he was himself convinced that if a measure were passed of an optional character an attempt to set up a Conjoint Board would fail. The English Committee for settling a Conjoint Board had held more than 50 meetings. In that Committee the College of Surgeons was represented by Sir James Paget and Mr. John Marshall; the University of Oxford by Dr. Henry W. Acland and Dr. George Rolleston; the University of Cambridge by Dr. G. E. Paget and Dr. G. M. Humphry; the University of Durham by Dr. G. H. Philipson and Dr. George G. Heath; the University of London by Dr. Richard Quain and Dr. W. B. Carpenter; the College of Physicians by Dr. James Risdon Bennett and Dr. Henry Pitman; and the Society of Apothecaries by Mr. E. Cradford and Mr. George Corfe. This Committee had given the fullest consideration to the subject, and they were strongly in favour of the change he now proposed; and he trusted that the same reasons which had induced him to propose a compulsory measure would also have weight with the Medical Bodies of Ireland and Scotland. The Bill provided that where a Medical Corporation refused to admit a student to their body, he having produced a certificate of having passed the examination of the Conjoint Board, the student should be entitled to go to the Registrar for the purpose of having his name inserted in the register as of right. This provision had become the more necessary since they compelled the Conjoint Board to examine female students; if, therefore, women were refused admittance to the Corporation, they would, under this provision, having passed the examination of the Conjoint Board, be entitled to be placed directly on the register. With regard to the penalties on unregistered practitioners, and kindred matters, these being practically the same as those in the Bill of last year, he did not think it was at all necessary that he should trouble their Lordships by going into details of the clauses. He might, indeed, now conclude all he had to say upon the Bill, if it were not for one subject, to which he had already lightly alluded, and that was the constitution of the Medical Council. He was sure his noble Friend (the Marquess of Ripon) would excuse him for saying that that was the rock on which shipwreck was made in 1870; and it was with a view to avoid a similar disaster that he proposed to touch the subject in a different way now. The Medical Council consisted of the representatives of the 19 various licensing bodies. There were six nominees of the Crown and a President appointed by the Council. He should like to read the names of the Council—The President, Dr. Acland; Crown nominees, Dr. Quain, Sir William Gull, Mr. John Simon, Mr. Teale, Dr. Fergus, and Dr. Hudson; representative members, Dr. Pitman, Sir James Paget, Mr. Bradford, Dr. Pyle, Dr. Storrar, Dr. Haldane, Dr. Orr, Dr. Wood, Professor Turner, Dr. Pettigrew, Dr. Aquilla Smith, Dr. Leet, Dr. S. Haughton, Sir Dominic Corrigan, Dr. Rolleston, and Mr. R. Macnamara. This was a very eminent body of men; and he might now say that no objection had reached him as to the qualifications of the Crown nominees. Certainly, in those he had recommended to the Crown, he had been actuated only by a desire to select the best men he could find in the Profession for the purpose, and from his knowledge of those appointed by his Predecessors in Office, he was confident that they were actuated by the same feeling. He was equally certain that those elective bodies had the same object in view, and would select men who were most competent and who would carry out their duties in the most efficient manner. He was sure he might say that his noble Friend opposite (the Marquess of Ripon) would corroborate his statement, that all those gentlemen had performed their duties faithfully and well. The Council had been in action for 20 years, and he thought all would agree that they had deserved well of their country. Of course, the argument of the eminence of those gentlemen, or reference to the manner in which they had performed their duties, did not weigh with those who thought there ought to be a representative Council, and those who desired to have votes in the representation and who desired to have the Council very much altered in its character. There were several schemes for the amendment of the Council brought forward by various bodies. One scheme was that there should be representatives of the whole Profession upon the Council. To enable them to do this some would increase the number of the Council. He did not adhere to that view, because he thought the Council was already sufficiently large. There was another proposal—that the bodies now sending representatives to the Council should have their number curtailed in order to make room for the representation of the Medical Profession at large. There was another proposal—that the number of persons nominated by the Crown should be diminished with the like object. All these were questions which seemed to him not unworthy of consideration; but they involved a very wide inquiry, and he certainly did not feel himself justified in including the matter in the Bill without further information than he possessed at the present time. It was, therefore, the intention of the Government to suggest that there should be a Committee of the other House appointed to inquire into the matter; and at the end of that inquiry, when that Committee should have reported, the Government would be able to see whether any, and, if so, what alteration in the Council was required. It did not seem desirable to endanger this Bill, which contained many valuable features, by interfering with this subject of the Medical Council. This measure could not be considered a Party measure in any particular sense, and he looked forward to receiving from his noble Friend opposite (the Marquess of Ripon)—than whom no one was more competent to give advice, because he had great experience in dealing with this subject—his valuable assistance in achieving what was the object of all—the maintenance of a high standard of professional reputation. He did not despair of the solution of what seemed to be a very difficult question, if the subject were, as he could not doubt it would be, fairly considered by their Lordships. He begged to present the Bill, and to move that it be read a first time.

Bill to amend the Medical Act, 1858—
Presented (The LORD PRESIDENT).

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, he had paid close attention to the statement of his noble Friend the Lord President, and should be happy to give him all the assistance in his power in passing the Bill. As his noble Friend was well aware, he was strongly impressed with the conviction that the most urgent reform in respect of medical affairs in this country in the interest of the public was the establishment of a single Medical Body for the three divisions of the United Kingdom, through which, and through which alone, persons should be able to get their names on the register. He understood his noble Friend intended to adopt that principle, instead of leaving it optional to the various Medical Bodies in England, Scotland, and Ireland to establish one Conjoint Board of Examination in each country. That he held to be the first object of medical reform at the present time; and he, for one, should approach the consideration of the Bill with every desire to give assistance to his noble Friend in passing it. It seemed to him that something might be said in favour of those provisions, which were inserted in the Bill of last year at his suggestion, but were modified in this Bill; but he should be ready to lay aside his own opinions on minor points, and he only hoped and trusted that others would do the same. With respect to the other part of the statement of his noble Friend, he was not surprised he had thought it wise to make a concession on the subject of the composition of the General Medical Council. He could fully bear his testimony to the correctness of the statement with regard to be paid were the debenture holders. He presumed that if the railway was abandoned the land would revert to the original owners. He could give no further information.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Charles Forster.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he was very much astonished at the course which had been taken with regard to this Bill. It was a Bill of considerable bulk and importance; but the House was left to gather its character from a perusal of the Bill itself, and hon. Members were well aware that as Private Bills were not circulated, hardly anybody was ever in a position to say for himself what was the nature of a Private Bill brought before the House. As a general rule, when they had a debate on a Bill of this sort they had a speech to explain its objects, or someone made a statement as to the nature of its provisions on moving the second reading. On this occasion they had had nothing of the kind, and the House was left to derive its notions as to what the Bill was from a perusal of the Bill itself, which, in regard to Private Bills, was a very difficult matter indeed. Now, it appeared that the City of London had lately appointed a new Remembrancer, and he believed that one of the duties of the Remembrancer was to jog the memory of hon. Members of that House in regard to Bills in which the City was interested, and to inform them of the character of each measure. He had received a statement that morning signed by the Remembrancer, but it was a statement of the baldest possible character. It merely stated that the Bill was coming before the House, and went on to say—

"The object of the Bill is the establishment of a new market, in lieu of the ancient Leadenhall Market, and the improvement of the neighbourhood by the formation of new streets."

No reason whatever was given why the House should pass the Bill, and the House was, therefore, put in the position of being asked to pass a Bill for which not one single word was said, and in regard to which no statement had been made to the House, except the two lines contained in the document of the Remembrancer, that—

"The object of the Bill was the establishment of a new market, in lieu of the ancient Leadenhall Market, and the improvement of the neighbourhood by the formation of new streets."

He was glad to see the Secretary to the Treasury (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) in his place. Last year they discussed very fully in the House the Cattle Bill, and the question was incidentally mooted of the establishment of a market monopoly in London, and the desirability of having new markets in London. Under the monopoly now enjoyed by the Corporation of the City of London, the construction of markets was very much mixed up with the City improvements, and this was done in such a way that it was impossible to gather from the figures laid before the House what was the profit or loss to the City upon their markets. The City contended that they lost money on the whole by the markets; but, on the other hand, it was contended that they made very large sums of money by their markets, but appeared to lose, because they mixed up the expenditure on markets with that incurred in the formation of new streets, which was not an expenditure of a remunerative kind. He to the ability of the members of that Council, their high standing and reputation, and the excellent manner in which they had discharged their duties. But there was no doubt there did exist, and had existed many years, a large amount of opinion in the Medical Profession that the Profession, as a Profession, ought to have a more direct share of representation on that Council. He did not desire to express an opinion on it at the present moment, except that when one saw a great body of the Profession entertain that opinion, it was quite fair and right that the subject should be investigated by an impartial inquiry before a Parliamentary Committee. All he trusted was that his noble Friend on one side, and those who were the cause of the failure of his own Bill of 1870 on the other, would take care that a question altogether distinct from the main object of the Bill should not produce a failure of the present measure. If the Committee, after considering the subject, should report that a change in the Medical Council was desirable, he hoped it would be carefully considered; but that no side interests of any kind would be allowed to interfere with the success of the Bill. He hoped there would be no delay with the second reading, as he thought it important the Bill should be speedily taken to the other House and considered there.

RAILWAYS—WRIT OF ELEGIT.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE DUKE OF ST. ALBANS rose to draw the attention of the Chairman of Committees to the statement in The Times of 6th of February, that Mr. Terry, a contractor, under a writ of elegit, obtained judgment before the Under-Sheriff of Oxfordshire against the Banbury and Cheltenham Railway, and that the jury had delivered 15 miles of land, of which they were possessed in that county for the construction of their line, in execution to the plaintiff; and asked the noble Earl, Whether the Parliamentary powers, under which such lands were acquired, in his opinion, allowed such a proceeding? It seemed to him that this case involved a very important principle. Railway Companies came to that House every year for compulsory powers to acquire land, and he thought their Lordships might reasonably ask that those from whom the land was thus taken should have some guarantee that its use should not be diverted from the purpose which Parliament had sanctioned. The popular opinion that a railway was the Queen's highway did not seem always to hold good, and especially before it was opened. He did not know if a writ of elegit, which gave the legal but not the actual possession, made any difference. He supposed it was impossible to expect the whole of the capital for carrying out these works to be found when the Company came to that House for their powers; but he thought a miscarriage of the intention of Parliament such as this should be impossible. Perhaps he ought to apologize for addressing the Question to the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees instead of to Her Majesty's Government; but he thought, from his long experience, the noble Earl would be able to give the House a very valuable opinion on the matter.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE said, that while not professing to be able to give a legal opinion on the Question asked, he did not think the statement in The Times was strictly accurate. The position of affairs, he believed, was this. Mr. Terry carried on the work intrusted to him in so unsatisfactory a manner that the Company discharged him and took the execution of the work into their own hands, and let the work and materials on the line to other contractors. The question of what Mr. Terry was entitled to receive for the work he had actually done was referred to arbitration. The award had been made, and Mr. Terry was found entitled to £5,000. The money was not paid, and Mr. Terry proceeded to take possession of the land by a writ of elegit. The finding on that writ was that the Company had acquired the land between the fencing to which the writ applied. Mr. Terry could get nothing off the land, there being no chattels on it belonging to the Company, and really he had gained nothing by his movement. It was perfectly obvious that whatever he had got was subject to the conditions under which the land was held by the Company under their Act of Parliament. The landowner, who had not been paid for his land, had the first claim, and next to him the persons to be paid were the debenture holders. He presumed that if the railway was abandoned the land would revert to the original owners. He could give no further information.

It merely stated that the Bill was coming before the House, and went on to say—

No reason whatever was given why the House should pass the Bill, and the House was, therefore, put in the position of being asked to pass a Bill for which not one single word was said, and in regard to which no statement had been made to the House, except the two lines contained in the document of the Remembrancer, that—

"The object of the Bill was the establishment of a new market, in lieu of the ancient Leadenhall Market, and the improvement of the neighbourhood by the formation of new streets."

He was glad to see the Secretary to the Treasury (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) in his place. Last year they discussed very fully in the House the Cattle Bill, and the question was incidentally mooted of the establishment of a market monopoly in London, and the desirability of having new markets in London. Under the monopoly now enjoyed by the Corporation of the City of London, the construction of markets was very much mixed up with the City improvements, and this was done in such a way that it was impossible to gather from the figures laid before the House what was the profit or loss to the City upon their markets. The City contended that they lost money on the whole by the markets; but, on the other hand, it was contended that they made very large sums of money by their markets, but appeared to lose, because they mixed up the expenditure on markets with that incurred in the formation of new streets, which was not an expenditure of a remunerative kind. He thought, therefore, that a statement to clear up this matter ought to have been made in moving the second reading of the present Bill, seeing that one of its objects was the formation of new streets. It appeared to him that if the Bill passed large tolls would be levied in Leadenhall Market at the expense of the consumer, which would be wasted or spent, as the case might be, in the formation of new streets, and the result would be that on the whole a loss would be shown upon the market, instead of what ought to be indicated as a clear gain. He was informed that the Bill did not come before the House with anything like the unanimous support of the Corporation itself. Quite apart from the question of the monopoly of markets possessed by the Corporation, he believed there was considerable opposition in the City itself to this particular Bill. The old Leadenhall Market had nearly died out. It was almost extinct, and had been replaced by a large number of very flourishing shops. The market itself, as a market, was, however, very nearly dead. The object of the present Bill was to revive a bygone state of things, and to create a new Leadenhall Market. It put down the 40 or 50 shops by which the old market had been replaced. With regard to the markets generally, the City monopoly had this result—that it produced a concentration of markets, all the markets of the Metropolis being either in the City or close to the borders of the City. He contended that this concentration of markets was a bad thing for the consumer. It caused a large amount of food to be brought into one place. Owing to the great size of London, it had to be carried a long way in order to get to where it was to be for the second time sold. The result of the concentration caused by the monopoly was that a large amount of food was kept so long that it became unfit for human food. If they were to have markets—and there was a doubt whether the market system was on the whole advantageous for London—they ought to be more scattered, and not concentrated in the City or close to it. In this case the City, by this Bill, were proposing to carry on a competition against their own market, because they had already one market in another locality in which they sold the same kind of goods which would be sold at the new Leadenhall Market. The competing market also was not at a very great distance from the proposed market. He believed it was the competition with their own market which had given rise to the great opposition which the Bill met with in the City; but he would not enter into that question, because he saw several hon. Members in their places in the House who were Aldermen of the City, and who would be better able to state what the facts of the case were. He had no desire at present to go into the matter at any greater length, because he felt it was inconvenient that the Public Business of the House should be postponed by too long a discussion upon a Private Bill. His only object in moving the rejection of the Bill was to elicit the opinion of those who had more acquaintance with the subject and all its details. He would only make once more the remark with which he set out, that the House was asked to read the Bill a second time without one word having been said or printed and sent to hon. Members to explain and support its provisions. He begged to move that the Bill be read a second time on that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months." — (Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. CHARLEY said, this was a very small Bill on which to found an attack upon the City of London. The Bill dealt with a very ancient market—a market established in the reign of Edward IV., and re-built nearly 150 years ago—in the year 1730. The Corporation of the City of London, having observed that Leadenhall Market was rapidly falling into a state of delapidation, thought that the time had arrived when the old market should be replaced by a new one better adapted to satisfy the wants of the people, and more accessible to the public. The Corporation proposed that this should be done at their own expense, and they asked in the Bill for the usual compulsory powers of purchase. That simply was the object of this Bill; but there was another matter included in it—the opening out of new streets. That question had been touched upon by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke), and if the hon. Member would look at the plans, which had been published by authority, he thought that the hon. Member would say that the new street, which it was proposed to run from Leadenhall Street to Fenchurch Street, would be a very great improvement, and would afford a very considerable relief to the traffic in that part of the City. If this had been a Bill brought forward by any other municipality than that of the City of London, he did not think that any hon. Member would have risen in his place to move the rejection of the Bill—the ordinary courtesy would have been extended to the promoters of the Bill of allowing them to go before a Private Bill Committee up-stairs, that they might have an opportunity of stating their case. But because the Bill was introduced by the Corporation of the City of London, the hon. Member for Chelsea, who entertained a great dislike to the City—as he did, indeed, to most of the useful institutions of his country—got up in his place and moved the rejection of the Bill. The hon. Baronet had referred to the monopoly of the City with regard to its being the market authority within a radius of seven miles round St. Paul's. No doubt it was so; but did the hon. Member want to erect a market in Chelsea? If he did not, he (Mr. Charley) did not see why the hon. Member should come down to the House to oppose the present Bill. It was simply a dog-in-the-manger policy. The hon. Member did not want a market for himself or for his constituents, and yet he objected to the citizens of London enjoying the benefits which this Bill would confer upon them. This was not a new market at all, but one which had existed from time immemorial. He trusted the House would reject the proposition of the hon. Baronet, and consent to read the Bill a second time.

SIR ANDREW LUSK remarked that, at all events, his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Salford (Mr. Charley) could not say that he (Sir Andrew Lusk) had no interest in the City of London. If he thought that the City had done what was right and proper in the case, he should not have risen to oppose the Bill. He need not remind those Members of the House who were interested in the matter that some 18 or 20 years ago, after the Cattle Market was moved up to Copenhagen Fields, several gentlemen, and among them Mr. Charles Pearson, conceived the idea of having the Metropolitan Railway made, and of moving Newgate Market and Leadenhall Market, and of constructing a new market on the site of the old Smithfield Cattle Market. That project, in the end, was carried out, and the City went to the expense of building a splendid new dead-meat market there, and in that market, by the authority of the House, Leadenhall Market and Newgate Market were included. The new market at Smithfield had been of great benefit to everyone who was engaged in the City. At the present moment, they were able to get along Leadenhall Street without having 50 or 100 butchers' carts standing in the street. It appeared to him somewhat singular that the same men who carried out this great improvement, so far as the City was concerned, should now desire to revive the old market in Leadenhall Street. It was of no use talking about the City doing this at their own expense. No doubt, they were going to spend £100,000 in reviving the old market; but it would be necessary to levy tolls in the market, and it would require a good many tolls to make up interest on that sum. These were really the facts of the case. Leadenhall Market at present was not a market, but a place where a great many stolen dogs were sold, and stolen cats, stolen partridges' eggs, stolen pheasants' eggs, and foxes, and things of that kind. Perhaps hon. Members would appreciate the advantages of that class of trade. He was not one of "our old Nobility." He did not count his acres by tens of thousands; but he could say this, and he believed he would be confirmed in what he stated, for it was a very important fact—that it was a great trouble and a great expense to produce food in this country—beef, mutton, and corn—for the people. And many hon. Members must be astonished when they looked at the enormous disparity between the amount they received for what they sold, and the sum they paid when they bought in London. He attributed part of this result to the concentration of markets in one place, which had the effect of raising up third and fourth and fifth men between the seller and the buyer. He did not think it was desirable for the benefit of those who bought and sold to concentrate the number of markets they now possessed. All the meat went to Smithfield, and all the fish to Billingsgate. In the case of the latter market, there was a great difficulty in getting there. Three-fourths of the people who wanted to go there could not get into the market. The streets leading to the market were constantly blocked up, and it was impossible to get access to Billingsgate. The consequence was that, in some way or other, more than 400 tons of fish every year were destroyed, because it could not get out of the market in time to be of use to the public. It was very questionable, therefore, whether it was desirable to revive the market in Leadenhall Street. He should like to know where the advantages were to be found? He spoke as a merchant in London. He and other merchants having business in the City wanted to get to their offices, and did not want to have the streets blocked up again, as was the case in times past. They had been endeavouring to set the traffic in the City free by the aid of the Metropolitan Railway, and other means. He objected, therefore, to the concentration of the markets of the Metropolis in the City where they were not wanted. There was nobody there to buy, and they had already a splendid market elsewhere. Therefore, in the name of the merchants of London, and of those who had business to carry on in the City, and wanted to get out and in, he asked the House not to concede to the Corporation permission to start another great market in the centre of the City. It certainly could not be recommended from a sanitary point of view; because, wherever they had a market of that kind, they got a great deal more dirt than was desirable. For these reasons, he appealed to the House to throw the Bill out, or, at any rate, to send it to a Select Committee to ascertain whether it would be for the benefit of the Metropolis generally to establish another market as proposed.

SIR THOMAS CHAMBERS pointed out that the request of the hon. Member for Finsbury (Sir Andrew Lusk) was all that the promoters of the Bill asked—namely, that the Bill should be sent to a Select Committee to ascertain whether it was a suitable Bill to pass or not. It was quite true, as the hon. Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) said, that no particular reasons had been circulated for the passing of the Bill; but it was by no means the rule that such reasons should be circulated. It was not uncommon to do so; but in the case of the majority of Private Bills he believed it was not the practice. The Bill was brought into the House, not on the authority of individuals or of private speculators, but upon the authority and credit of the Corporation of London. And as to the Corporation not having been unanimous in its favour, it was hardly necessary to remind the House that the Corporation was unanimous on very few subjects. But what Corporation was? He could not help telling the House that his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Sir Andrew Lusk), who had just spoken, knew very well that the maintenance of Leadenhall Market was a concession on the part of the Corporation of London to the feeling of the inhabitants of the neighbourhood. Indeed, there was a Petition, signed by upwards of 10,000 persons, praying that this very ancient market should be maintained in their midst. But the Corporation of London could not keep Leadenhall Market in its present condition. It had fallen into decay, in a certain sense, in its trade and in its buildings, and in all the accessories of a market it was absolutely deficient. There was, as had already been pointed out, no proper access to it. No doubt, his hon. Friend (Sir Andrew Lusk) would be disturbed in coming to and going from business if there was no better access to the market than existed now; but the object of the Bill was to do that which, however, was complained of by his hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke)—namely, to carry out street improvements at the same time that the market was made. The hon. Member for Chelsea made it a matter of complaint against the Corporation that whenever they made a market they made street improvements in order to give a better access to it. The hon. Member for Chelsea also complained of the market monopoly enjoyed by the City of London. Now, if there was one duty which more than another imposed a primary obligation upon a united municipality, it was that of making provision for markets for the use of such united municipality. It was a duty of every municipality to take charge of that matter so far as it could, and in London, with a population of 4,000,000 of persons at stake, it was the imperative duty of the Corporation to take the lead. At the same time, it was a matter of great difficulty to provide markets to which the people would resort. Lady Burdett Coutts spent hundreds of thousands of pounds in establishing the Columbia Market. The great object which Lady Burdett Coutts had was to provide accommodation for the buyer. She did everything that could be done to make that market a success; but she did it all in vain. Then, again, did not the City take away one of the greatest scandals that existed in London before most hon. Members were born—the Fleet Lane Market—which was situated opposite a ditch, and build a beautiful market in the same neighbourhood—the Farringdon Market? But it had been a dead failure, and the new market had never taken root at all. Again, in close contiguity with the Great Northern, the North-Western, and the Midland Railways, in an admirable situation, amidst an immense population, a market was established which was intended to supply food cheaply to the public. Upon this new market great efforts were expended and large sums of money spent. An admirable market was built; but no customers would come. He could multiply instances of the same kind. It was by no means easy to plant a market. Let anyone try to plant one at Chelsea. A market in London was the most delicate thing in its constitution that could be imagined. And some which had been in existence for 30 or 40 years were comparatively empty and without profit. The Corporation of London had spent £2,500,000 in markets; and as far as the income of the Corporation was concerned, they were none the better for the markets they had built. They had built them because they considered, and he supposed the House would also consider, that it was one of their primary obligations to do what they could towards performing the daily miracle of feeding 4,000,000 of people with food—meat, fish, and fruit, and all other things necessary. No doubt, the obligation which thus fell upon them was well discharged. Whether it might be done better was another question, but that it was done well at the present moment nobody could doubt. Four hundred tons of fish might be condemned every year, not through the fault of the market, but through a fault which, in many cases, happened before the fish arrived in London at all. All the Corporation asked was that the Bill should be allowed to go to a Select Committee. No doubt, the Corporation were divided about it. It was a competition with their own market; but that was rather in its favour than against it. It showed that they were willing to allow competition with their own market, if a demand was made for it by a sufficient number of their constituents, who felt that a local market would be of advantage to them. His hon. Friends the Members for Chelsea and Finsbury said it was a great mistake to bring all the markets to one point and to pass a Bill with that object. But the arguments of his hon. Friends would not hold water at all. If the Bill went before a Select Committee, and if it then turned out that there was no reason why it should be passed into law, the House might depend upon it that it would not be passed into law. But, at any rate, it ought to be read a second time; and if the Select Committee thought it was a proper measure to become law, they would be bound to pass it.

MR. W. H. JAMES thought the Corporation of London would have done wisely, and have shown a little more worldly wisdom, if they had taken the advice once given by a distinguished statesman, who said—"Why cannot you let it alone." It would be within the recollection of the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley) that the whole of this subject of markets was raised last year in the discussion of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill. At that time it was said that it was rather an awkward and undesirable thing that the question should be raised at that particular moment. He thought this movement ought to have been a little longer deferred, and then the Corporation could have come forward boldly and have asked Parliament to support their Bill. The hon. and learned Member for Salford said that it was a very small Bill. Primâ facie he was ready to admit that it was, and that there was a tolerably good case for improving Leadenhall Market if it was ever again to be used as a market. In its present condition, the market was a very dirty and disagreeable place. But if it was a small Bill, it was one that affected a very large question; and he must contend that the present provision for the supply of markets over the whole of the Metropolis was absolutely indefensible. There was not on the Surrey side of London a single market. Walworth and Camberwell were destitute of markets. Then, again, on the North side of London, there were no markets either at Stoke Newington or Hoxton, and nothing was proposed to be done there for providing anything in the shape of market accommodation. No doubt, the present Bill would have slipped through the House unnoticed if it had not been for the hon. Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke). Hon. Members had only had to-day to gather information. He (Mr. James) had inquired in the Library if there was any information to be gathered upon the question of markets. There were very few subjects which some time or other had not been inquired into by that House; but the only information to be obtained on the question of markets was to be found in some little evidence given before a Royal Commission which inquired, in 1854, into the finances and general state of the Corporation. And the evidence taken at that time all tended to show that even then the want of markets in London was greatly felt, and was, indeed, something absolutely deplorable. No Committee of the House of Commons had ever at any time inquired into the subject; and he asked the hon. and learned Member the Recorder of London (Sir Thomas Chambers), whether he was prepared to contend for a single moment that the City of London, the population of which was dwindling away every day, and was not more than 75,000 at this moment, was the proper authority to possess the entire market monopoly of this great Metropolis, with a population of 4,000,000 of people? He had no wish to attack the Corporation of London; but he thought he had the right to defend the wants of the Metropolitan ratepayers, who had no good opportunity for expressing their opinion on this or any other question. In the absence of favourable markets, costermongers' carts filled the streets, and distributing their garbage in every direction, were instrumental in placing the thoroughfares in a bad sanitary condition. Sometimes, when unable to sell their wares, they took them home and deposited them in their backyards; and the consequence was that many of the homes of the poor were placed in a very unsatisfactory sanitary condition. He had placed an Amendment on the Paper in regard to the present Bill, the effect of which was that after it had been read a second time it should be sent to a Select Committee nominated by the Whole House. At the time the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill of 1869 was brought in by his right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), the right hon. Gentleman proposed to take away the monopoly now enjoyed by the Corporation of the City of London, unless they complied with and fulfilled certain conditions which were considered necessary in the interests of the inhabitants of the Metropolis. As the Corporation had not complied with and fulfilled those conditions, it was only a reasonable request that the House should now be asked to refrain from passing this Bill, which dealt with a small part of the larger question, until the whole matter had been inquired into by a Select Committee. If this proposition were not accepted, he should feel it his duty to offer an uncompromising opposition to the second reading of the Bill. He must confess that from time to time these ancient and antiquated privileges possessed by the Corporation required revision. The whole thing ought to be gone into entirely, and made the subject of a full and complete investigation. If the Corporation objected to inquiry, the House could only come to one conclusion — namely, that they were afraid of giving a full explanation, because they knew perfectly well what the nature of the exposé would be, and that, when weighed in the balance, they would be found wanting.

MR. ALDERMAN COTTON, in supporting the second reading of the Bill, said, he could assure the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. James) that the Corporation of the City at all times courted inquiry, and nothing would please them more than to answer any queries addressed to them by a Select Committee or any inquiry which the House might be pleased to make. With regard to the Bill now before the House, it was pretty well known that the market at Leadenhall was one of the most ancient markets in the City. The land on which it was built was the property of the City of London, and the Corporation, in their present Bill, simply asked the House to allow them to improve that market and the approaches thereto. The City had been moved to take this action by one of the largest, most influential, and most honestly signed Petitions ever presented to the Corporation of the City of London. It contained upwards of 7,000 signatures, all duly certified with name and address. It was one of the most useful markets in London, and, situated as it was on the borders of Gracechurch Street, it was easily approached both from East and West, and North and South. Then, again, the market was required by City men themselves, who lived mostly in the suburbs, and required to take their provisions home with them. In the market every necessity could be obtained, and he failed to see what advantage would be derived from destroying this very useful market. He certainly hoped that the House would not listen to the hon. Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke), and let it go forth to the City that the markets, which had always been well conducted, and had always given satisfaction to those who frequented them, were no longer required. He trusted that the House would reject the Amendment and read the Bill a second time.

MR. W. E. FORSTER remarked that if this Bill came up from any Corporation in the Provinces, he did not suppose that the House would waste any time in its discussion. It seemed to him to be a very reasonable Bill, so far as it took power to improve a very ancient market. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down described the market of Leadenhall as one of the oldest in London; but the whole difficulty in the case arose from the fact that the market authority of the Metropolis was not the municipality of the whole of the Metropolis, but the municipality of only a small part of it. His hon. Friend behind him the learned Recorder of London (Sir Thomas Chambers), in his eloquent pleading for the City, told them there was no greater duty a municipality could perform than to look after the markets. That was perfectly true, and he did not for a moment deny it. But, in this case, what were the conditions? It was proposed that the Corporation, which represented some 200,000, or even a much less number of the inhabitants of the City, should provide markets for the 4,000,000 which formed the whole population of the Metropolis. They could not now go into the question whether they ought or ought not to intrust this special power of providing markets to the City of London. The power did exist at the present moment, and it was proposed now, to some extent, practically to extend it. One great argument which had been used by the City when fresh markets had been projected was that they had already spent a great deal of money upon markets, and that there ought to be no competition. At the present moment, however, some little difference of opinion seemed to exist among the Corporation as to the propriety of having a competition among themselves. And by the Bill now before the House, he understood it was so proposed to alter Leadenhall Market as to make it a market of competition with the existing markets. He thought if they did that they afforded a very fair ground for the rest of the inhabitants of the Metropolis to say that their interests ought to be thoroughly considered when the Bill got into Committee, and that they ought to have a full opportunity of opening the whole of the Market Question. His hon. Friend the Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Raikes) would correct him if he was wrong; but his impression was that if this Bill went upstairs without any special direction, but simply as an ordinary Private Bill, the consumers in the Metropolis would not have a locus standi before the Committee. He imagined that the Metropolitan Board of Works would have a locus standi on account of their Building Acts which gave them power over the erection of buildings in all parts of the Metropolis, even including the City of London. But he did think that when they were proposing to establish a fresh dead-meat market, which was to be not merely for the sale of meat to consumers in the City, but for the sale of meat to consumers outside the City, that the consumers in all parts of London should have a locus standi. At the same time, he did not believe they could have that locus standi unless the Bill was referred to a Select Committee, nominated by the Whole House in the manner proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead (Mr. James). He did not suppose that there would be any real objection to that proposal. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Alderman Cotton), who was well acquainted with the feeling of the Corporation of London, said there was nothing the authorities of the City would court more than an inquiry into the matter. If they really desired to have the whole question fairly sifted in the interests of the consumers, he could not help thinking there would be no real objection to the suggestion of his hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead (Mr. James). Under these circumstances, he hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) would not persist in his opposition to the second reading of the Bill, but would allow the Bill to be read a second time with the view of having it referred to a Select Committee nominated by the Whole House.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON thought that if this was an attempt to construct an absolutely fresh market outside the jurisdiction of the Corporation of London who were the promoters of the Bill, it was possible the objections which had been raised to it by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke), and his right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. W. E. Forster), might have considerable force and weight with the House. In such a case—he did not say that he agreed with the proposal—it might fairly be argued that if such an attempt were made by the City to extend the number of their markets, the time had come when they should consider generally the question whether the old Charter granted to the City of London constituting them the sole market authority of the Metropolis, was one which ought not in some way to be altered. But he would remind the House that in this instance they were not dealing at all with any such creation of a fresh market. All he understood from this Bill was that the City asked within their own limits and under their own Charter to provide, instead of a market which at present was inadequate for the wants of the locality, a better market on the same site—carrying on the history of the market from the past, only under improved conditions.

Such being the simple object of the Bill, it rendered it difficult, he thought, for the House to refuse its assent to the second reading. They knew perfectly well that the Bill would be submitted to the consideration of a Committee upstairs, where, as his right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) had said, the Metropolitan Board of Works would have a locus standi, and where the owners of property in the neighbourhood who objected to it would also have a right to be heard. But the question, which the right hon. Gentleman referred to, of the consumer's interest, would arise simply on the creation of a fresh market outside the limits of the existing one, and not in the continuing of a market which existed at the present moment, and which would be found of great convenience to the locality in which it existed. Although he was not in a position to speak with the same authority as hon. Members for the City upon this matter, he believed that, in connection with another market in the City—Billingsgate Market—there were people who had business in Leadenhall Market, and therefore any idea of satisfying the wants of the traders, or customers who had for so long a period been accustomed to the market in Leadenhall Street, would not be met by sending them to the market in Smithfield, which the City held as another outlet. He confessed that he was considerably surprised at the arguments adduced by his hon. Friend the Alderman who represented the borough of Finsbury (Sir Andrew Lusk). The hon. Baronet had endeavoured to prove to the House the disadvantages of centralizing all the traders in one market, and had then asked the House to refuse the continuance of the second market in Leadenhall Street. The two things did not seem to him (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) to be consistent, so far as the interests of the consumers in the Metropolis were concerned. He thought the whole of the arguments they had heard upon the Bill had simply been addressed to the general question which ought to be raised at some other time, and which certainly did not apply to the continuance of Leadenhall Market, which had been, and would be, under the proposed arrangement, a useful addition to the market purposes of the Metropolis itself.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW said, the district affected by the Bill occupied a very large portion of the ward which he represented in the Corporation of the City of London. He trusted that the House would consent to read the Bill a second time on account principally of the very great improvements which it would effect in the City itself. It would, among other things, enable the old Hide Market in Leadenhall Street to be properly utilized, and a new street would be carried from Leadenhall Street to Fenchurch Street, which would greatly facilitate the traffic in that part of the City. There was a very strong feeling in the district in which the market was situated that the market itself ought not to be abolished, and an important Petition signed by a very large number of persons had been presented to the House, praying that the market should be continued. The Bill now before the House was in reality a compromise. The City had consented, at the request of a very large number of persons, to continue the market. But what was the market? There was in reality nothing that could be called a market. There were two wholesale dealers, a few small shops, and a variety of dealers in foxes, dogs, cats, rabbits, and all sorts of animals; but to call it a market from which was distributed any considerable portion of the food of the Metropolis was a folly and absurdity. It never could be made a large market in its present condition, for this reason. It was right in the centre of a block of houses, and at the present time it could not be got at except through a few narrow courts. The hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. James) asked why they should not leave things alone? Now, that was the very thing they ought not to do. At the present moment, it was an abomination and not a market at all, and it was so situated that it could not be carried on as a market. He hoped that the House would consent to the second reading of the Bill, and leave it to a Committee upstairs to determine whether it would be an improvement to make the new street and re-constitute the market, or whether it would be an improvement to be without any market at all.

MR. RAIKES said, his right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) had asked him a question in regard to the locus standi of the citizens of the Metropolis if the Bill went before a Committee upstairs in the ordinary way. He was not aware that the consumers in this case would have any more locus standi than they would have in any other case. Their opposition was precisely the same as that of the consumers in Liverpool or Manchester, supposing the Bill had been introduced by the Corporation of Liverpool or Manchester in regard to the markets already existing in those towns. He hoped that the discussion, which had no doubt been a useful one, would not end in a division; because, although the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. James) and the hon. Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had shown that there was a great deal of interest felt out-of-doors with regard to the monopoly possessed by the Corporation of London in regulating the markets of the Metropolis, it appeared to him (Mr. Raikes) that this was hardly an occasion, nor did the present Bill afford the most fitting opportunity, for conducting an inquiry into that subject. The Corporation of London, by this Bill, asked for no power to make any new market, or to make or regulate any market beyond the limits of the City itself. If, therefore, in any case the promoters of a Bill ought to be allowed to proceed and to bring forward their Bill in the ordinary course of procedure, adopting the usual mode of dealing with questions which formed the subject of Private Bills, this was a case of that nature. If it were intended by this Bill to establish a new market in the borough of Chelsea, or if it were a proposition which involved in any way the opening of new markets on the Southern side of the river, where he had every reason to believe market accommodation was greatly required, such a proposal would certainly have afforded a fair opportunity for instituting such an inquiry as that suggested by the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. James), and the hon. Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke). But on this occasion the Corporation of London, as the promoters of the Bill, were merely asking to be allowed to improve an already existing market, which was altogether unfit for the purposes for which it was intended. It was notorious that the present market at Leadenhall was inconvenient and difficult of access. The Corporation of the City proposed as part of the present Bill to construct a new street, and he believed that such a street would be a very great convenience to that part of London. Under all the circumstances, it did appear to him that it would be hard upon the Corporation of London that they should be placed in the trying position of attempting to carry out improvements that were essentially required, and, at the same time, that their action should be hampered by requiring them to enter into a long and troublesome inquiry as to the nature and advantages of the general powers which they possessed by Statute. He trusted that under these circumstances the House would allow the Bill to follow the ordinary course, and be sent, not to a special Committee, but to an ordinary Committee, who would have full power to go into all the details of the matter in the ordinary way. He might, perhaps, be allowed to add in regard to the question which had been raised with respect to the costs being defrayed by heavy tolls, which would ultimately come out of the pockets of the consumers, that that was a matter which an ordinary Private Bill Committee had full power to investigate, and it would be their duty to see that no injustice was done by the imposition of any undue charge. He hoped that, under all these circumstances, the House would now consent to read the Bill a second time.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he proposed to accept the advice of his right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) and allow the division to be taken on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. James) to refer the Bill to a Committee nominated by the Whole House, after it should have been read a second time. He, therefore, begged to withdraw the Amendment which he had submitted to the House.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time.

MR. W. H. JAMES moved that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, to be nominated by the Whole House.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in seconding the Motion, said, he had only one remark to make, and he wished to make it in reply to an observation which had fallen from the Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Raikes). The Chairman of Committees spoke of the consumers in London being in the same position as those in other towns. That was hardly the case. In other towns they were represented by the Corporation, but in London they were not.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be committed to a Select Committee."—(Mr. James.)

SIR THOMAS CHAMBERS remarked that the Bill was promoted under the authority of the Corporation of London, and the nature of the measure had already been fully stated. It was not to establish a new market, but simply to improve an old and existing one, and a more unfair occasion for raising any general question of the kind which had been suggested, and of which it must be remembered the Corporation had had no notice, could not be conceived. The whole object of the Bill was merely to re-construct a tumble-down market, and give a better access to it.

The House divided:—Ayes 83; Noes 137: Majority 54.—(Div. List, No. 28.)

Bill committed.

QUESTIONS.

CRIMINAL LAW—THE REV. H. J. DODWELL.—QUESTION.

MR. J. COWEN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been drawn to the statements that have appeared in the medical newspapers, respecting the mental condition of the Rev. H. J. Dodwell, who is now confined as a criminal lunatic; and, if it would be safe to order his release?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I wish that I could give a favourable answer to this Question; but I am afraid it is not in my power to do so. I had this gentleman examined on the 31st of May by one medical officer, who certainly decided that he was insane. He was again examined in June by two other medical officers, when the same answer was returned. In consequence of a report which appeared by Dr. Winn and Dr. Forbes Winslow, I thought it better that he should be examined again by two perfectly independent gentlemen. I wrote to the Lunacy Commissioners asking them to name two gentlemen to undertake such an inquiry. They did so, and those gentlemen examined him on the 18th of September, and their opinion was that he was decidedly insane, and that it would be unsafe to liberate him. I gave instructions that information should be sent to me of any improvement in his condition; but I am sorry to say that I have received no report.

PAROCHIAL BOARD (SCOTLAND)—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. HIBBERT asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill, during the present Session, to carry out the recommendations of last years' Select Committee respecting the election of Guardians of the Poor in England and Ireland, and of Parochial Boards in Scotland?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, a Poor Law Board Amendment Bill had been prepared which would deal, among other things, with the more important recommendations of last year's Select Committee respecting the election of Guardians of the Poor in England and Ireland; but he could not say anything about the Parochial Boards in Scotland. He hoped the Bill would be introduced by his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Local Government Board as soon as the state of Public Business would permit.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—PRESBYTERIAN AND WESLEYAN CHAPLAINS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. COWAN asked the Secretary of State for War, with reference to his statement as to sending Catholic Chaplains with the troops to South Africa, Whether, as there are now or will shortly be three Scotch regiments out there, he will consider the propriety of sending out Presbyterian Chaplains to be with some or all of the Scotch regiments?

COLONEL STANLEY: Yes, Sir; it is intended to send out one Presbyterian chaplain, but we do not intend to send more at present, unless Lord Chelmsford should express a wish that we should do so.

MR. WADDY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, as there are now or will shortly be a large number of Wesleyans in the army in South Africa for whom when in barracks at home and on foreign stations the Wesleyans provide church accommodation and clerical supply without asking for assistance or repayment from the Government, he will consider the propriety of allowing Wesleyan Chaplains to accompany the troops in proportion to the number of declared Wesleyans sent out?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, I have received a letter from the Wesleyan Foreign Missionary Committee, stating that they had directed four of their missionaries at the Cape to report themselves to the Commanding Officer of the Army against the Zulus. I propose to reply to this letter that, though it is most desirable to limit the number of non-combatants, I should have no objection to instructing Lord Chelmsford to admit as many of their number as he thought desirable, and to give them such opportunities as he might think proper for carrying out their ministrations.

EMPLOYERS LIABILITY.

QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When the Bill which has been promised by the Government on the subject of employers liability to compensate their workmen for injuries in certain cases, will be introduced into the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I am not able, in the present state of Public Business, to name a day; but I hope we shall be prepared to introduce the Bill before Easter.

NAVY PROMOTION—ORDER IN COUNCIL, 1872.—QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it has not hitherto been the rule or practice in Her Majesty's Navy to promote sub-lieutenants to the rank of lieutenant at the end of four years service; whether it is intended to alter that rule or practice by extending the period of service; whether such an alteration will not affect the promotion of officers of all grades and their prospects as to the rank upon which they might have to retire; and, whether such alteration is to apply to officers now serving who entered upon service under the hitherto existing rule or practice?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, there was no fixed Regulation which determined the period of service for sub-lieutenants to obtain their promotion; but latterly it had been the practice to promote them after four years' service. The Order in Council of November, 1872, gave the Admiralty the power to do so, provided the list of sub-lieutenants was above 250. The number was now below that figure, so that promotions could only be made under the provisions of the Order in Council of March, 1870, which provided that until the list of active lieutenants should have been reduced to 600, only one in every four vacancies, caused by retirement and promotion consequent thereon, should be filled, but that vacancies caused by death were to be filled as they arose. He was not in a position at present to say that the Admiralty had any intention of altering the system which prevailed; but he would admit that the slower promotion did very seriously affect sub-lieutenants and other officers.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT — INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether the guardians of an Union have power to pay for the maintenance of a child sent to an Industrial School upon complaint made by the local authority of a school district not having a School Board; and, if not, how in such case sec. 12 of the Education Act of 1876 can be carried out?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, some doubt has arisen whether the local authority, being a school attendance committee and having sent a child to a certified school, has power, with consent of guardians, to pay for the maintenance of the child. Assuming that they have not the power to pay, the prison authority would in such a case be the disbursing authority. We propose, however, as the point is of some importance, to refer it to such legal authority as will settle the case one way or another.

Mr. Serjeant Simon

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked, Whether, in case the prison authority had the power, the resolution of the guardians or school attendance committee would bind the prison authority?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he could not answer that Question; but it would be referred to the legal authority.

EGYPT—DESPATCH OF SHIPS OF WAR.—QUESTION.

MR. ELLIOT asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If the statement in "The Times" of yesterday is correct that France has ordered the despatch boat "Renard" to Egypt, and an English ship is going in the same direction; and, if so, whether these vessels have any special or joint mission?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, it is true that an English and French ship have been ordered to Alexandria. The Governments of England and France deem it desirable, in present circumstances, that there should be a ship of each nation in Egyptian waters. No special mission has been given to the commanders of those ships.

ARMY—THE 24TH REGIMENT—OFFICERS.—QUESTION.

MAJOR O'GORMAN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is intended, as reported in the public prints, to send to South Africa six Officers of the Guards and three of the Line to fill up the places vacated by the Officers of the 24th Regiment lately slain in action?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, it is intended to send out the officers to whom the hon. and gallant Member refers, but it is under these circumstances. The draft for the 24th goes out 533 strong; obviously they could not go without officers; but those officers do not belong, nor will they be posted to, the 24th Regiment.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—OFFENDING TEACHERS.—QUESTION.

MR. J. C. BROWN asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether, considering the serious consequences to both teachers and schools where the teacher is found guilty by the inspector of certain offences, and that they are put in the black list without power of appeal, he would take into consideration the constitution of some Court of appeal; and, if there is any intention to throw the inspectorate open to Public Elementary School Teachers, many of whom would be well qualified for the position?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, the present practice is not for the Inspector to convict, but to send in his report to the Education Department, where the case would be personally investigated by one of the heads of the Department, and the teacher convicted only when, in the opinion of this official, the evidence is conclusive. Teachers are not at present debarred from becoming Inspectors, the Lord President being ready to consider the claims of all persons who, in his opinion, have the qualifications necessary for the proper performance of those duties.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT, 1878—MERSEY DOCK AND HARBOUR BOARD.—QUESTION.

MR. MAC IVER asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether his attention has been called to the large and immediate expenditure proposed to be made by the Mersey Dock and Harbour Board in providing accommodation to meet the requirements of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act of last Session, and whether the approval of the Privy Council has been obtained as regarded the works about to be undertaken, and whether the whole of such works are necessary?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, the Mersey Dock and Harbour Board have applied for and received the sanction of the Lords of the Council to their proposal to erect lairs and slaughter-houses on certain landing places in the port of Liverpool for the reception of foreign animals. No correspondence has taken place in reference to the cost of the proposed erections; but it is believed that the accommodation will not be more than adequate to the requirements of the trade. For some time past the accommodation for landing, lairage, and slaughter of foreign animals in the port has been insufficient.

MEETING OF THE HOUSE.

Resolved, That this House will meet To-morrow at Two of the clock.—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MOTIONS.

BANK DEPOSITS.—RESOLUTION.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA, in rising to call the attention of the House to the subject of deposits in the banks of the United Kingdom, and to move—

“That, in the opinion of this House, it is worthy of the consideration of Her Majesty's Government whether a moderate and discriminating scale of Stamp or composition Duties may, with advantage to the interests of the Country and of the Banks, be hereafter applied to all interest-bearing deposits in the Banks of the United Kingdom, and whether a Bill on that subject should be introduced to Parliament at an early date;”

said: The subject to which I desire to draw the attention of the House to-day is not one forced upon my own mind by the contemplation of those recent financial disasters which may be said to have culminated in, rather than to have commenced with, the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank. I feel it due to myself to say this, and to remind the House that in a period of profound repose—when no one dreamt of the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank, and none outside its walls suspected its solvency—on the 16th of May, 1876, I occupied the attention of the House for above an hour in demonstrating, or to the best of my ability in endeavouring to demonstrate, that the system of banking credit which prevailed in the United Kingdom was of a nature which of necessity must produce at irregular but constantly recurring intervals the panics and crises, with the appearance of which most of us are unhappily familiar. I have no intention of going over the same ground in the same terms as those which may be found in Hansard of 1876, because many of the results and conditions which I then predicted as likely to arise have so lately come to pass as to be actually within our present cognizance, and the recency of such occurrences enables me to dispense with all such arguments as were of the nature of foreboding in 1876. My main contentions are that the system of deposit credit which has grown up in the joint-stock banks of the United Kingdom is essentially unscientific and practically unsound, and that the tendency of the evil is to increase and not to cure itself, as some people imagine that such things are likely to do if left to themselves. There are, as I estimate, about £300,000,000 to £400,000,000 sterling of deposits held by the various joint-stock banks of the United Kingdom on which these banks pay interest to the depositors. The great bulk of these deposits is again lent by the banks, and employed by the borrowers in carrying on the trade, manufactures, and other enterprizes of the United Kingdom. If we were not to look beneath the surface, as we are now about to do, I admit that things in ordinary times look natural and sound enough; but when we examine the conditions under which these £300,000,000 or £400,000,000 are borrowed and again lent, we find a state of things singularly unstable, and, as it has always appeared to me, actually dangerous to the interests of the trading community of the Empire. The instability and the danger arise from the three following conditions, which are inherent in the present system:—First, the banks which borrow the £300,000,000 or £400,000,000 at interest undertake to repay the depositor in each case, either on demand or at a very few days' notice. Second, the condition under which the banker borrows the money being to pay interest upon it, he is necessitated to re-lend it at interest to someone else at a somewhat higher rate than that which he himself pays, or to invest it in some security on his own account. Third, there is not a sufficiency of solvent borrowers to take from the banker on discount of trade bills anything approaching the large amount which the banker has to lend; nor can the banker lend what he does lend on terms—as to repayment on notice—as stringent as those to which he has himself submitted. Now, these are the three conditions which constitute, or out of which arises, the unsoundness which needs legislative intervention. I maintain that it is unsound business for any man, whether banker or not, to borrow at interest money which he may be called upon to repay at an earlier date than he can be certain of having the means of repayment, and that which is unsound in principle on a single transaction cannot be sound by being multiplied into a thousand or a million of such transactions. But what the present system amounts to is simply the multiplication of the first unsound transaction by thousands or tens of thousands in reliance on an assumed and unscientific doctrine of chance, that while business is kept going there will be always sufficient coming in, or which may be made to come in, to meet outgoings and repay depositors. I grant that under the normal condition—a fair trade, and a clear political horizon—not only is there no difficulty, but there is a great ease in carrying on the business of the country under the system which prevails; but that very fact adds most seriously to the difficulties which arise in seasons unfavourable to the trade, manufactures, or agriculture of the Empire. People hope that a system which has gone on for many years doing much good may go on for ever doing but little harm. I do not take this view, quite the contrary; but, nevertheless, I say that it is still possible, without any great organic change, without any shock to credit—without any injury to existing interests—nay, with immediate and enormous benefit to those interests, to guard against and obviate the dangers and disasters which, if not guarded against, before very long will, I apprehend, prove inveterate and irremediable. It must not be supposed that the only evil, or even the chief evil, is that which is developed when a bank fails; a tremendous amount of injury is done to the interests of traders by the means which, under the present system, are had recourse to to prevent a bank from failing, and these means or measures become indispensable solely in consequence of what I will describe as the improvident system under which money is borrowed by the banks from their depositors, and the consciousness on the part of bank directors and managers that it is of vital importance to them, and, therefore, a kind of duty under the present system to maintain an appearance of prosperity in adverse times, lest their credit suffer in the minds of those whose moneys they hold, reclaimable with interest on demand, or at a few days' notice. I do not wish to repeat myself in this House; but if hon. Members desire to learn my views as to the origin and growth of the several financial panics of the last half-century, they will find them set out in Hansard's report of my speech in May, 1876. I have nothing to vary, and but little to add to the history there told. What has since happened in Glasgow, South

Sir Joseph M. Kenna

Wales, and elsewhere, is in my opinion only a natural sequel to that history. The frantic efforts of the City of Glasgow Bank for the last 10 years to appear prosperous, originated, no doubt, from the consciousness of the directors that the bank was at the mercy of depositors who might recall their moneys at a few days notice. Even at a period when they may have been solvent, and before their capital was irretrievably lost, this reverse was by no means improbable if they confessed to any impairment. I will, however, treat the City of Glasgow Bank as an exceptional case. I found no argument, and point no moral out of it at present, save to this extent—that it proves the terrible expedients to which directors will have recourse to avoid reducing their dividends. But now the question arises, how are we to deal with a state of credit which has grown up about us, and how are we to deal with the business and interests of institutions of such importance as the joint-stock banks of the United Kingdom? Well, Sir, I think I see the way to do so without doing any violence to the principle involved in the right of private contract, and not only without injury to existing banks, but with great and incalculable advantage to those institutions whose interests I not only do not disregard nor underrate, but desire in every reasonable way to protect. Now, the process whereby the results, which I desire to bring about, may be reached is essentially simple, and it is one quite in accordance with the principles of our present laws of contract and of finance. We all know that a bill of exchange is not a lawful instrument in the United Kingdom, unless it has impressed upon it—or in the case of foreign bills negotiated in this country affixed to it—a stamp denoting a duty paid to the State at the rate of 1s. per cent—that is to say, at the rate of 1s. for each £100 of the amount of such bill without regard to whether the currency of the bill is for 10 days or 12 months. Thus a £100 bill pays a 1s. stamp duty, a £500 bill 5s., and so on. There is, however, another system of duty applicable to bills and notes by which the duty is not calculated nor levied upon the amount of each bill or note separately, nor represented by a stamp impressed or affixed. That other system is that which provides that a composition duty shall be levied in lieu of stamp duty on all bank notes in circulation, and on bankers' bills, which are permitted to be issued without any stamp impressed or affixed. The composition duty now known to the law is levied at the rate of 7s. per cent per annum on the average amount of the bank notes or bankers' bills which the bank has in circulation during the year for which the duty is payable. Now, what I recommend being done in the case of interest-bearing deposits is to adopt the principle involved in both systems to meet the varying conditions under which interest-bearing deposits are accepted by bankers. I wish to introduce certainty and forethought into the system of taking deposits. I start with the assumption that if any solvent man, banker or anyone else, borrows money on which he pays or agrees to pay interest, he must, in order to indemnify himself, invest the money in some security, negotiable or otherwise. I next say he should know absolutely when the money he borrows will become payable by him, and he should be prepared to pay it on the day of maturity. I assume that there is a period within which a banker will have time to turn his money—that is to say, to employ it profitably and to repay it without difficulty. I assume such a period to be three months. I assume that the great bulk of the deposits in the banks of the United Kingdom could and would be as well fixed by the depositors at renewable periods of three months as they are now at a few days' notice; but, although I assume this, I am not about to propose that any hard-and-fast line of three months, or any other period should be adopted. I simply propose to make it for the advantage of the depositor, if it be convenient for him to do so, to lodge his money for three monthly periods, renewable by him at his option, and without trouble of any kind. I will now endeavour to explain how all this may be done consistently with those principles of free contract which no hon. Member of this House would more jealously watch over than I would myself. The State has always exercised the right of imposing a tax on contracts in the nature of a stamp duty or a composition duty, in lieu of a stamp impressed or affixed. Ordinary bills of exchange pay a stamp duty at the rate of 1s. per cent, and this duty is quite as high on a bill payable at three days' date as on one drawn for three months. It is the practice of business that the man to whom credit is given by taking his bill, or one for whose accommodation a bill is issued, pays the stamp duty. In the cases of bankers' notes there is no stamp impressed or affixed; but the banker pays a composition duty in lieu of stamp duty on his notes and post bills in circulation, at the rate of 7s. per cent per annum on the average amount he has had in circulation during the year. I mention these facts, and the state of the law in these respects, in order to be able to show as I proceed that the changes which I recommend for adoption are no violation of the principle of freedom of contract, nor any innovation of principle whatsoever. If a banker pays a composition duty at the rate of 7s. per cent per annum on the bank post bills which he draws, payable at seven, or 10, or 15 days, or any other date, there is no violation of principle in subjecting him to a far lighter composition duty in respect to the average amount of credit which he may obtain by the issue of his deposit receipts. I confess, however, I have no object of raising Revenue in view. I simply seek to introduce a principle of order into the system of interest-bearing deposits, for the protection of bankers and the public alike from the fitful and panic-breeding conditions which have insensibly grown up throughout the whole of the United Kingdom. I propose that in future there shall be two classes or kinds of deposit receipts established by law for bankers—the one which I would call the statutable deposit should be issued repayable at three months from the date of the deposit, and if not demanded at its maturity should be again fixed as payable at three months from the day of maturity, and so on from time to time, being, in fact, a three-monthly renewable deposit. I would have the banker to pay some duty on all such deposits—say, for example, 2s. per cent per annum—that is to say, 6d. per £100 for each three months, as a composition in lieu of stamp duty on the average amount he held of money during the year on these statutable deposits. This impost would fall solely on the banker, and would be paid by him in the same manner that bankers now pay a composition duty in lieu of stamp duty on their bank post bills or bank notes in circulation. I assume that in this new class of deposits the banker would derive sufficient advantage from the nature of the contract that he could well afford to pay the 2s. per cent per annum to the Crown on such transactions. But then the question arises, how are we to deal with these depositors who are not satisfied to lodge money at three months with their bankers, but who wish to lodge it at one month, or at 10 days' notice, or at some other currency? Well, there is nothing complicated in my plan. I propose that in all such cases the depositor, and not the banker, should feel the incidence of the duty, and that he should have 6d. per cent deducted from the interest payable to him by the banker for each period less than three months and as fixed by himself for which he had lodged his money. The banker would, of course, be merely a receiver of the duty to pay it over to the Crown, and there would, of course, be a provision that the duty should never operate as a greater charge than could be provided for out of the accrued interest. Now, that is the sum and substance of my plan, free from all mere technical detail. The advantages which I foresee would arise from this system are very great indeed. I believe the three-fourths, probably the seven-eighths, of the deposits now lying in the joint-stock banks of the United Kingdom would be converted into statutable deposits; and the immediate effect of such a translation would be to render it possible for every well-managed bank in the worst of times to provide for every demand upon it without requiring to raise money in any irregular fashion. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

Mr. COLLINS, in seconding the Resolution, said, he thought his hon. Friend the Member for Youghal was entitled, under the circumstances of the case, to the thanks of the House for the able and clear way in which he had put forward his views on the question. It seemed to him, however, that his hon. Friend had underrated the value and importance of the subject by fixing the amount of the interest-bearing deposits in the banks of the United Kingdom at a sum of £300,000,000 to £400,000,000 sterling. He (Mr. Collins), after careful investigation and examination, had come to the conclusion that they amounted to something approaching £1,000,000,000 sterling. There were in England and Wales 119 joint-stock banks, with a paid-up capital of £37,000,000; in Scotland 11 joint-stock banks, with a paid-up capital of £9,000,000; and in Ireland 9 joint-stock banks, with a paid-up capital of £7,000,000; and there were, having offices in London, 56 foreign and colonial banks, with a paid-up capital amounting to £44,000,000. In round numbers, that would amount to about £100,000,000 of paid-up capital. Then, again, there were 190 private provincial banks in the United Kingdom, and 50 private banks in London; and, on the same basis of calculation, he believed it would be found that the amount of capital engaged in the 240 private banks could not fall far short of £100,000,000. Then, with regard to interest-bearing deposits and current accounts, he could not find any authorized published returns of a reliable character on which to base a calculation; but in order to arrive at the best estimate in his power, he took the yearly reports of 20 joint-stock banks, and he believed he was safe in concluding that the interest-bearing deposits and current accounts together reached about six times the amount of the paid-up capital of all those establishments. From his own experience he would deduct for current accounts one-sixth of the entire sum which would leave £1,000,000,000 as the interest-bearing deposits of the United Kingdom. He had made a calculation as to what that sum would produce to the Exchequer, and he found that at the moderate sum of 1*d.* per cent per month, or 1*s.* per cent per annum, it would produce a revenue of £500,000. He thought, however, that the proposal of 2*s.* per cent for every three months, which would produce £4,000,000 per year, was too high. [Sir JOSEPH M'KENNA said, his proposal was 2*s.* per cent per annum.] He was glad to find that he was in error. He and his hon. Friend were at one as regarded the principle of the proposal. There might be differences of view in regard to points of detail; but the principle involved in the question was of serious and grave importance, and deserved consideration. The great objects his hon. Friend had in view were to give increased security and confidence to the public, and to facilitate bankers in controlling the enormous sums with which they had to deal in the conduct of their responsible business, and in protecting them against the unnecessary and most injurious panics which, without cause or reason, at times influenced public opinion. The discussion of the question would at least have the useful result of directing public attention to it; and if opinion in the country were found favourable to its consideration, the Chancellor of the Exchequer might be the better enabled, if he thought fit, to embody in the measure, which it was said he had in contemplation, some provisions dealing effectually with the entire subject.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is worthy of the consideration of Her Majesty's Government, whether a moderate and discriminating scale of Stamp or composition Duties may, with advantage to the interests of the Country and of the Banks, be hereafter applied to all interest-bearing deposits in the Banks of the United Kingdom, and whether a Bill on the subject should be introduced to Parliament at an early date."—(Sir Joseph M'Kenna.)

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD said, he was sure the House would feel indebted to any hon. Members who brought before it the subject of commercial crises, and propounded any reasonable and just remedy against their recurrence; but if the House were to be misled into lending the high sanction of its authority to any scheme which was not wise, and which was not truly calculated to attain this object, it would do enormous harm by leading public opinion astray after a will-o'-the-wisp remedy instead of keeping fixed on the true principles which alone could save them from crises. It appeared to him that the proposal made by the hon. Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) would be utterly inefficacious for the purpose aimed at. It seemed to be thought that the large amount of deposits in banks were more or less the cause of these crises; but it was not the fact of large deposits being in banks which led to bad banking or to crises; it was the employment of deposits by a minority of bankers and other persons engaged in monetary business that led to great evils, the consequences of which could not be exaggerated. He was glad to hear it said, for the credit of bankers generally, that the case of the City of Glasgow Bank was an exceptional case; it was due to the bankers that that should be said. Unhappily, there had been one or two other cases which could not be characterized as anything but discreditable to the persons concerned. But, on the other hand, if the House would remember how many hundreds, if not thousands, of banks and branches in England, Scotland, and Ireland had been conducted, some of them for more than a century, and many for more than half-a-century, without disaster, in spite of great fluctuations in credit, in the supply of money, and in the success of trade, we might congratulate ourselves that scandalous cases like that of the City of Glasgow Bank had been so few, and that, on the whole, our banking system was not unsound. The Mover and Secondor seemed to differ rather widely as to the aggregate amount of deposits in banks, and he had not seen any computation that could be relied upon; but whether they were £300,000,000 or £1,000,000,000, he did not concur in the opinion that bankers could not find enough good borrowers, and were tempted, by the very magnitude of their deposits, to lend on doubtful securities. He had never experienced any difficulty in finding borrowers; sometimes there was a difficulty in finding lenders, but there was never any in finding borrowers. He did not think the difficulty troubled most bankers, and he did not admit that the purchase of securities of a right kind was an improvident investment; it was a most wise and legitimate investment of those deposits; but well-managed banks did not rely upon them generally, and certainly not at a time of pressure. He did not see any reason why the banks should not have these large sums as deposits. As to the remedy proposed, if the unlucky depositor happened to forget to put down the date, his money would be locked up for another two months against his will; but the maker of that proposal reckoned without the public—depositors would be unwilling to submit to it. It was not proposed to place any restriction on the large amount of money deposited in banks, not at sight, but at call; and bankers might play ducks and drakes with that as disastrously as with money deposited at interest. In many cases money at call did bear a small interest; so the proposed distinction failed again. These restrictions and interferences could not do any good, and they were calculated only to deceive and trouble the public. No doubt, any act of their lives might be taxed; but that was not a sufficient reason for taxing special transactions or tradesmen unless due cause were shown. It was not urged as a primary reason for this proposed tax that it would produce Revenue. It was supposed that it would restrict deposits; but he did not believe it would have the slightest effect on them, any more than stamps had on bills. All bad bills had borne stamps, and bankers would be improvident with deposits whether they were stamped or not. As to there being no violation of the freedom of contract in what was proposed, there did seem to be a violation of freedom in preventing a man doing what he would with his own. The hon. Mover had entirely failed to prove his case, and he hoped the House would not lend its support to the Motion. Attention ought to be directed to a comparison of the state of this country with that of France, which had comparatively few changes in its rates of discount, and scarcely any commercial crises like ours. It was worth inquiry whether that was due to the large metallic basis of her currency, or to any other cause. He should be glad to co-operate in promoting an inquiry into that subject, as well as into the possibility of suppressing frauds by more stringent legislation, which he thought was wanted. Such inquiry would be worthy of the support of the House.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he must enter his emphatic protest against the House attempting to legislate as to the principles or way in which bankers should manage their business. Such action would, he was convinced, lead to great evil, and he was perfectly certain that it would be of no possible use. He protested, also, against bankers being taxed in the way proposed. No doubt it was the first duty of the banker, or any person receiving money on deposit which he engaged to pay back at a certain time, to take care that he had it when the time came; but to lay down a rule for a particular description of banking, although it might offer a bait to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, would be opposed to the principle of our legislation. He trusted, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman would not rise at it. What did the hon. Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) mean by banking? Did he exclude the Rothschilds, the Barings, and a dozen others, who, although not called bankers and not paying a small tax which the Chancellor of the Exchequer managed to get from bankers, were the bankers of half the great Powers of Europe and in all parts of the world? How did the hon. Gentleman propose to deal with those great firms? He (Mr. Hankey) was convinced that when the hon. Gentleman came to the point, he would find it almost impossible to define what was meant by a banker, when it was proposed that a particular transaction should be carried out in a particular way. He agreed with the remarks made as to the risks run by bankers receiving money on deposit and allowing interest, and yet subjecting themselves to have it recalled at very short notice, or at call, which was worse; but the matter was so fraught with difficulty that he was surprised to hear a banker of the hon. Member for Youghal's experience treat it in such a manner. Great evil resulted from the undue expansion of that risk; but the principle of allowing interest was sound, for bankers were but agents between lenders and borrowers; but he denied that on that account they ought to be singled out for taxation.

MR. W. SHAW said, he had listened with great attention to the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna), and he was sorry to say he could not support his Resolution. There was nothing in the world to prevent banks at present agreeing to take deposits at fixed periods of one, two, or three months, at all events, so far as Ireland was concerned. The Resolution would do nothing to avert panics; because, at present, banks must base their calculations on the law of probabilities, and, if they were wise, should always be prepared to pay a certain amount of their liabilities, so that it really did not affect the facts of the case whether the money was taken for a fixed period or not. As to the other question, of placing a tax on deposit receipts, for money deposited upon short notice, he hoped the right hon.

Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not entertain the proposal; because, while it would fail to bring in a large amount of Revenue to the Government, it would most certainly very seriously interfere with the business of banking, by introducing into it certain elements of trouble which would most seriously affect it. For instance, it would materially lessen the banking fund on which the business of the country mainly depended. There was the competition between bank and bank; and it must also be remembered that the Post Office savings banks, and other similar institutions for the deposit of money, competed largely with the regular banks and tended to reduce the amount of the general banking fund. If the right hon. Gentleman were to tax the deposits at the bankers, it would be like taxing the raw material of the manufactures of the country, and would prove most injurious to commercial enterprise, without in any way preventing the recurrence of panics. The question of the means that should be taken for preventing the recurrence of panics had doubtless been well pondered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and he (Mr. W. Shaw) hoped that he would that week bring before the House some proposal which would touch the very source of the evil complained of. There was one branch of banking with which the right hon. Gentleman might fairly deal, and that was with reference to the note circulation of the country. He might look at the circulation of the country banks, and see whether he could not give facilities for the amalgamation of the small ones. He believed that in England especially an immense deal of the evil was due to the great number of small banks, for when there was anything like fear of a crisis they would make a special effort to prepare themselves for the evil. That, of course, pressed on the whole finances of the community, and often led to the very crisis which they dreaded, and which, but for them, would not have existed. He thought it would be wise of his hon. Friend not to press the Motion to a division.

MR. HERMON said, the money on deposit in the banks was borrowed at 1 per cent below the bank rate and lent out at 1 per cent in advance of it, and the margin represented their profits. If they kept a sufficient sum in hand to meet the ordinary amount of withdrawals, there was no danger in that business. Where the danger did lie was in the fact that the great banks were ready to receive from their customers amounts to the extent of £15,000,000 or £20,000,000, repayable at four or seven days, while they were in the habit of lending it on three months' bills. And then, again, these bills were maturing at different dates. He had listened with great attention to the arguments of the hon. Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna), but did not think that his plan would be acceptable to the public, or that it would effect the end he wished to attain, and therefore he could not support it. At the same time, he agreed that the rules of banking required consideration.

MR. COURTNEY said, the House seemed disposed to give but scant justice to the plan laid before it by the hon. Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna). He (Mr. Courtney) thought, however, that if some plan could be adopted which would prevent deposits being made for short periods, bankers would be protected from the sudden calls to which they were now subject. He did not at all agree that the proposal of the hon. Member would diminish the savings of the country; but thought, on the other hand, that it would encourage deposits at a longer notice, and that deposits at short notice and at call would necessarily be abandoned. The idea that the savings would decrease was chimerical, for they would still accumulate and be the foundation of trade. Nor did he agree that it was a conclusive argument against the proposal that it interfered with the conduct of bankers' business. Banks had been interfered with time after time, and notably in 1844 by Sir Robert Peel. He must say, however, that he did not at all see how the proposal would work except upon the condition that stamped deposit receipts were to be given for all sums deposited. Neither was he convinced that it would avoid the evils which the hon. Member sought to avoid. The hon. Member was bound to convince them on both these points before he could expect them to support him. How could the Chancellor of the Exchequer secure the stamp duty on the deposit notes as they came in to be periodically renewed? He did not believe that the plan would prevent the recurrence of panics, inasmuch as panics had arisen over and over again long before joint-stock banks and the practice of receiving money at call or on deposit for short periods existed. Panics depended upon far larger causes than money being received on call. There was another reason which had been alluded to by the hon. Member for Plymouth (Mr. Sampson Lloyd)—namely, that if they gave any countenance to that proposal they would pro tanto interfere with that sense of responsibility on the part of bankers on which they must so largely rely. He thought they had good reason for relying on that sense of responsibility. No doubt, they had had the disastrous failure of the City of Glasgow Bank. But let them look at the vast number of banks which had so long conducted their business on just and sound principles, with a due sense of the responsibility that attached to them, and which were always ready to meet their engagements. It required stronger arguments than any yet adduced to justify the laying down of the proposition that if a man was willing to lend another a sum of money for a certain time the State should interfere because that bargain was likely to be injurious to the community. The hon. Member for Cork County (Mr. W. Shaw) had suggested that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should consider the advisability of promoting the amalgamation of the small banks. He (Mr. Courtney), however, hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would approach that suggestion with very great caution. Danger arose already from the fact that they had banks having hundreds of branches scattered over the Kingdom, and which were superintended by the directors of the central establishment, who often could not possibly exercise the control which was necessary, if the business was to be properly conducted, with so many separate branches. They could not have the directors of a bank in London exercising that due supervision over the borrowing and lending transactions of hundreds of country branches, without which the conduct of its affairs must sometimes be put in jeopardy.

MR. MUNTZ said that, in the course of a long experience, that was the first time he had known a Member, and especially a Member of the Opposition, come forward with a proposal to increase taxation. He must protest against that House assuming to itself the function of meddling in the management of the commercial, or, rather, imaginary commercial, affairs of the country. It would be practically impossible for any law to regulate deposits to work, and there was no more reason why they should interfere with the management of banking than with any other business. No doubt, there had been some very great swindles and most infamous frauds in connection with banking; but those cases were very exceptional, and it was one of the most wonderful things that, in spite of the want of confidence caused by the frightful calamity in Glasgow—one of the most wicked that ever occurred in the banking history of the country—and by the failure of a bank in the West of England, the great body of the banks in this country had so managed their affairs that nothing of importance had occurred to them. The arguments of the hon. Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) went to discourage deposits. But deposits were the very things they ought to encourage. Those deposits, received by the banks and then lent out, judiciously, to those who wanted accommodation at the time, fertilized the whole trade of the country. An hon. Member had put the total amount of these deposits at £1,000,000,000 sterling; but he (Mr. Muntz) thought it must be nearer £2,000,000,000. Why were they to interfere with the accommodation afforded by the private banks, which had, on the whole, been prudently managed? The hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) said Parliament had been constantly interfering with banking, and he had quoted what was done by the late Sir Robert Peel. Now, Sir Robert Peel, no doubt, put an end to the capacity of the private banks to make money; for that was what their power of issuing notes really amounted to. He, however, knew of no plan brought forward by that great statesman and skilful financier for interfering with the management of banks. To suppress their capacity of making money was a totally different thing from interfering with the internal affairs of banks. The proposal now before the House would have a mischievous effect, because it would tend to check that confidence which he was glad to see now entirely restored.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, that the people of Scotland would view with great disfavour any proposal of the kind made by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) in his Motion. They, although few had suffered more, did not attribute what they had suffered from the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank to the system of taking deposits. That system had, he (Sir Graham Montgomery) believed, conferred incalculable benefit on the Scotch people. In 1826 it was estimated there were not more than £20,000,000 of deposits in all the banks of Scotland. Now, he believed, they exceeded £70,000,000. It might be said that it was a dangerous principle to encourage the deposit of money at call; but, as far as Scotland was concerned, it had answered extremely well, and he should be sorry to see any interference with that. Any proposal such as that now made to the House would, he was sure, notwithstanding all the suffering that had been inflicted by the great failure to which he had referred, be viewed in Scotland as a serious interference with the rights of banking; and he hoped that the hon. Member for Youghal would not persevere with his Motion.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER presumed, after the discussion which had taken place, that the hon. Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) would not ask the House to express any opinion on his Motion by a formal vote. But he thought everyone must feel that they were indebted to the hon. Gentleman for having brought on a very interesting discussion, and one which could hardly fail to be of value. He thought they ought also to make this acknowledgment—that the proposal of the hon. Member had not been made merely under a feeling of excitement, owing to particular events which had recently occurred, because, as they knew, that was a matter which had been in his mind for some considerable time; and before the close of last Session he distinctly intimated his intention of bringing forward the proposal embodied in his speech of that evening. At the same time, the sense of the House would, he thought, go entirely with the tenour of the remarks which had been made by so many hon. Members, by his hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mr. Thomson Hankey) and others, on both sides of the House—namely, that it would be altogether indiscreet and incompatible with the Rules which should guide them in their Parliamentary proceedings that Parliament should undertake to interfere with the details of the management of a business such as banking. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) had, as he thought, most accurately distinguished between the course taken by Sir Robert Peel in regard to banking and the course now proposed. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had always understood that the principle on which Sir Robert Peel proceeded was that banking, as banking, ought to be left as free as possible. But as to the power of issuing money, that was a matter which was properly under the control of the State, and one which the State ought to regulate. There was no doubt that, in regulating the question of issue to a certain extent, the liberty and the proceedings of the issuing banks were interfered with; but that was only as a subordinate part of the main object of that legislation, the regulation of the issue. Now, having adopted the proposition which he had laid down, that it was not a part of the functions of Parliament to regulate the details of a business such as banking, and having stated that it was undesirable that they should come to a Resolution on such a question, he thought he should be inconsistent with his own doctrine if he were to attempt to examine that proposal on its merits, because the ground he would rather take was this—that it was a proposal, although useful to converse upon, the merits of which they should not discuss too minutely. At the same time, he would say that it struck him that there was something rather inconsistent on the face of the proposal in one respect; because, as he understood the hon. Member's argument, it was this—Inasmuch as the necessity for making a sufficient profit out of the deposits on which interest was paid to cover the interest paid to the depositors and leave a margin, necessarily tempted bankers to invest in risky securities in order to get a high rate of interest, it seemed to him a rather curious remedy that they should add to that temptation by imposing a tax on the banker, who would not only have to cover the interest he had to pay his depositors and to get a little profit for himself, but also have to cover the tax to be paid to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He did not wish, however, to discuss that point very much. He admitted that there was something very tempting in the suggestions of the hon. Gentleman who had brought this matter under the notice of the House. When they referred to the £500,000 a-year which he might realize as Revenue, he could not help saying, like the Governor in The Critic on his being offered £1,000—"Thou hast touched me nearly." If he saw any object of taxation which it was proper, and which it appeared convenient to tax, he should be right in proposing that a tax should be laid upon it for the purpose of raising a Revenue. But when it was proposed to impose a tax, not for the purpose of obtaining a Revenue, but in order to regulate a business, he was obliged to regard the proposal from another point of view. With respect to this particular question of a tax on deposits, many hon. Members might remember that in former times there used to be a tax on deposits. Up to the year 1853 there was a stamp duty on all receipts given for money lying at interest. In that year the tax was done away with. In 1870, when the consolidation of the Stamp Laws was effected, the Bill was so drawn that it contained a clause that would have imposed the tax again; and he believed that, on the Motion of the late Sir David Salomons, the House again decided not to re-impose the tax. In consequence, the Bill was so amended that the tax was not introduced. He was not quite sure, however, that the whole question of the stamp duty and of income tax on money derived from deposits was in an entirely satisfactory state. He thought the subject required consideration; but hon. Gentlemen were aware that the interest derived from deposits was liable to income tax. The banks did not, however, deduct that income tax, and therefore the recipient was left to pay the tax himself. That was not always a convenient mode of raising the money. He mentioned this fact, which was a separate one, incidentally, only in order to show that he had all these questions under consideration. With regard to the hon. Member's proposal, which was that they should introduce taxation so as to discourage the system of deposits, that was a matter with which the House had better not attempt to interfere, and in which he could not encourage it to interfere. A conversation of this sort was valuable on account of the opinions it elicited, even although the House might stop short of action in the matter; and what was said in the House might assist in dispelling misunderstandings elsewhere.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA acknowledged the question was not quite ripe for decision. He should, therefore, with the leave of the House, withdraw the Resolution, at the same time thanking it for the attention it had given to the subject. He further hoped that the discussion would have the effect of keeping the public mind directed to banking.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE WATER SUPPLY.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. E. S. HOWARD, in rising to move—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the supply of water to the manufacturing districts of Lancashire and the west of Yorkshire, and any deficiencies likely to arise therein; and, whether it is necessary or expedient to resort to the Westmoreland and Cumberland Lakes to make good any deficiencies in such supply; and, if so, to what extent, and under what conditions, such resort should be sanctioned,”

said, that he felt it necessary to submit the reasons which induced him to call attention to this subject a second time. Last year he placed upon the Paper Notice of a similar Motion, but the Eastern debate intervening, he was compelled to postpone it, and he then raised the question by moving the rejection of the Manchester Corporation Water Bill, stating, at the same time, that if he was successful in obtaining the rejection of the Bill he should move for a Royal Commission. The reason of his opposition to that Bill was that it was a Bill of too great public importance to be dealt with by a Private Bill Committee, but that a careful investigation was demanded. The present Prime Minister, in one of his earlier works, stated that the opinion of a country was better represented through the Press than through Parliament; and if that statement was as full of “sense and truth” as some of his later utterances were said to be, they were fully justified in carrying on their opposition to the Bill, because almost the whole Press of the country united in condemning it. The result of their efforts last year was that a Select Committee was appointed, with special instructions, to “Inquire into and report upon the present sufficiency of the water supply of Manchester and its neighbourhood, and of any other sources available for such supply: To consider whether permission should be given to make use of any of the Westmoreland and Cumberland Lakes for the purpose; and, if so, how far, and under what conditions: To consider the prospective requirements of the populations situated between the Lake District and Manchester: To inquire and report whether any, and, if so, what, provisions should be made in limitation of proposals for the exclusive use of the water of any of the said Lakes.”

The opponents of the Bill agreed to the conditions, because they believed they contained the principle for which they had been contending—namely, that the question was one of public interest and importance; that the inquiry ought to be public; and that the expenses of fighting it should not be thrown entirely on those individuals who had formed themselves into an Association for preserving the natural features of the Lake District. The Committee commenced at once to regard the case simply as one between the promoters and opponents. They did not seem to have sought any further evidence. Now, it was impossible for that Association to which he had referred, with its limited means, to present such elaborate plans and details as Mr. Bateman, the Engineer to the Manchester Corporation, was able to produce. The Manchester Corporation had the services of Sir Edmund Beckett, who treated the evidence of the opposition in his usual complimentary manner, and the Committee seemed to have adopted his views. They said, moreover, that the evidence which had been adduced as to the supplies which might be obtained from other sources was unworthy of consideration, and thus simplified their task by assuming that there was no other water supply. He (Mr. Howard) had been told that evidence was offered to them of an entirely different and most comprehensive scheme, and that they declined to go into it. He maintained, therefore, that the opponents of the Bill had raised a prima facie case that there were other sources of supply, and that the Select Committee ought to have gone further than they did; and that that Committee did not use the powers with which they had been armed to the extent to which the public had a right to expect. The Committee seemed to accept the statements of the promoters of the Bill without sifting them. Take, for example, the question of population. To begin with, there was a remarkable discrepancy on this point. When the Bill was first introduced into this House, a deputation from Manchester waited on the Chairman of Ways and Means, and, in presenting their case, the Mayor of Manchester said that the number of people the Manchester Corporation had to supply with water was 800,000. But a few weeks afterwards, before the Committee, it was stated by the promoters of the Bill that the number of people was over 900,000. He (Mr. Howard) did not know whether these people had been hastily manufactured in the interval, or how Manchester had increased so rapidly; but if the population of Manchester was to keep on increasing with such power of multiplication, any scheme for supplying them with water short of a reproduction of the Flood would fail in its object. One of the main allegations of the supporters of the Bill was that in less than 10 years there would be a deficiency in the supply of water at the present rate of increase in the population. Twenty-five million gallons was the present supply, and they admitted that that would be sufficient for 1,000,000 people; but they said that before 10 years the population of Manchester and district would have increased to 1,300,000, and that, therefore, there would be a deficiency of water; and they argued that, because it would take seven years to carry out their present scheme, there ought to be no delay in passing their Bill. But how did the Committee arrive at that estimate? They took the number of additional houses and warehouses erected each year in Manchester and the neighbourhood, allowing five persons to each house. That was the way the estimate was arrived at that Manchester and the neighbourhood would increase to so great an extent. It ought to be remembered, however, that the time at which these calculations were made was a time of exceptional prosperity, when houses and manufactories were springing up like mushrooms; and he (Mr. Howard) did not think the number of additional buildings in any one year formed a sound basis on which to calculate the increase in the population. Taking the Census itself, the figures told quite a different tale. The increase was estimated by the Committee and by the Manchester Corporation to be very nearly 39 per cent; whereas, if estimated according to the last Census Returns, the increase would only be 12½ per cent. Perhaps he might be told that the increase rose in every decennial period. On the contrary, the fact was that when they came to compare those periods since 1821 they would find a regular decrease. The county of Lancashire gave a return of 27 per cent from 1821 to 1831; from 1831 to 1841, 25 per cent; from 1841 to 1851, 22 per cent; from 1851 to 1861, 20 per cent; and from 1861 to 1871, 16 per cent. Taking Salford and South-East Lancashire, the percentage decreased from 30 per cent in 1821-31 to 13 per cent in 1861-71. Therefore, the estimate of the Select Committee was formed on entirely erroneous information. Beyond this, the independent investigations which the Committee had made had cost the Treasury simply six guineas—and this in a scheme which involved an estimated outlay of £4,000,000; which estimate would probably increase much faster than the population which had to pay it, and which would more like reach to £6,000,000 before the works were completed. He, therefore, contended that the Committee had limited the nature of their investigations to such an extent that the inquiry was not at all adequate to the subject, and that they failed to give it that consideration which the public had a right to expect. However, they passed the Bill with certain alterations. They were very good alterations. They required that Manchester should supply all the towns on the line of conduit, and supply it at a profit of not more than 5 per cent. That did away with the speculative character of the Bill, because it was notorious that the object of the Corporation was to obtain a monopoly of this supply, and then to sell it to all the towns which might be hard up for water for as much money as they could get. The House of Lords threw out the Bill on the Standing Orders, and it had been introduced again this year, amended in accordance with the proposals of the Select Committee. Therefore it was that he had now thought it worth while to ask the House to pause once more before sanctioning this scheme — a scheme which involved such great alterations in the features and characteristics of the Lake District which many of them prized so high, a scheme which involved the outlay of a sum equal to that which Her Majesty's Ministers thought fit last year to ask the House to grant for the preservation of the Empire. He asked the House, before sanctioning such a scheme, to institute a thorough inquiry into the whole question of the water supply of those districts. The importance of the subject was too evident to need demonstration from him. About 10 years ago a Royal Commission was appointed to consider the water supply of London, and they were also instructed to extend their inquiry to the provincial towns. But the nature of the first inquiry was so protracted that they could not go into the second, and they merely laid down a few general principles, and pointed out a few gathering grounds for future investigation. The further investigation had not taken place, and if it seemed important then it must be much more important now. No doubt he should be told that because a Select Committee had already inquired into the subject there was no need for further inquiry; but he submitted that he had already shown that the inquiry of the Select Committee of last year was of too limited a nature, and was not such as the public had a right to expect. He thought he had also shown that their estimates of the increased population of Manchester and the probable requirements of that population had been much exaggerated. It was admitted that the present waterworks of the Manchester Corporation cost more than was estimated; and, no doubt, it was in order to make up for that that the Corporation had been obliged to sell the water to manufacturers which had been intended for future generations. This had occurred in years of prosperity, when new manufactories sprung up in the district, and that was the reason why they were short of water now, when their works ought to have lasted much longer. They were told on the highest authority that the present depression of trade was due to over-trading. Perhaps they might not have an opportunity of repeating that process for sometime to come, and no doubt they would be glad to postpone it as long as possible. He thought, therefore, in all the circumstances, delay would not be a misfortune to Manchester, but rather a great boon and benefit, by delaying or preventing the execution of this scheme, involving such an enormous outlay to the ratepayers, and calculated as it was to reproduce that distress from which they had so recently suffered. For these reasons, he asked the House to assent to the Motion. If a Royal Commission were appointed, they would insure that the Lakes should not be subjected to such operations as were contemplated by the Bill until other resources had been fully inquired into and found wanting; and if the Royal Commission should decide that it would be right and proper to use the Lakes for the purposes contemplated, they would lay down limitations as to interference with the natural features and characteristics of the district; but if the Bill were allowed to pass, and the Royal Commission were not granted, and if Lake Thirlmere were to be "restored to its ancient condition," they should submit to the inevitable result, and see their Lakes taken one after another and "restored" to their ancient or some other shape by some eminent engineer. He was afraid there were many persons, although he was not one of them, who would agree with the wish of an eminent Professor, that "rather than see the waters of Thirlmere brought to the tops of the houses of Manchester, he would prefer to see the houses of Manchester brought to the bottom of the waters of Lake Thirlmere." The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

MR. WHEELHOUSE, in seconding the Resolution, said, that he was strongly of opinion that it would not only be in the interests of the people of the West Riding of Yorkshire, but also in the interests of the ratepayers of Manchester, to have this question of water supply from Thirlmere fully inquired into. He might say that no one would be more willing than himself to facilitate any measure for supplying the inhabitants of Manchester with an abundant supply of water; but he denied, in the first place, that there was any danger of a water famine in that town; and, in the second place, he believed the Thirlmere scheme was the most expensive that could have been devised by the Corporation of Manchester or any other body of persons. The people of Manchester had quite close to them, in Derbyshire, one of the most admirable gathering grounds that could be imagined—a gathering ground which could give a supply of water for any length of time and in any circumstances, at a rate infinitely less than it would cost to get water from the Cumberland Lakes. There were, of course, those who would tell them that the people of Manchester knew their own concerns best, and that they could undoubtedly carry on their business better than anybody else. Now, while giving the people of Manchester every credit for the proper comprehension of their own affairs, he would accept any such statement on this particular question with more or less reserve, and for this reason—that he believed the idea of gathering water for the legitimate supply of Manchester on the spot where it could be most usefully utilized had never been dreamt or thought of practically until the Thirlmere Water Scheme had taken possession of certain minds in the Corporation of Manchester. And, again, the Corporation of Manchester itself was not unanimous by any means in favour of the Bill, for after the scheme was introduced into Parliament there was ample evidence of this. It was well known that, in the first instance, it was the intention of the Corporation of Manchester to become practically a huge association of dealers in water; and that if they had been successful in passing this Bill in its original form, they would have proceeded to make their own terms for the supply of water to other towns. They also knew, as a matter of fact, that if the Corporation of Manchester succeeded in getting their Bill, even in its amended form, and were allowed to appropriate the Lake, a precedent would be established for other towns to follow. Other Corporations would assuredly come to Parliament and say—“We want this Lake, or that Lake,” with the inevitable result that at last there would remain no available source of supply for West Yorkshire. Leeds itself, and the other large towns, it was true, could not be said to have a bad supply of water; but when they came to the small manufacturing towns in the district running from Todmorden to the east of Leeds—a very wide district, indeed—they found that immense pressure had existed on account of the general want of an adequate supply of water. The water supply had been certainly deficient throughout this network of small towns and villages; and to allow any one Corporation to say to the inhabitants of West Yorkshire—“We will appropriate by Parliamentary powers, if we can get them, the whole of a large Lake, and you may get your supply as best you can,” would be a matter calculated, not only to irritate, but to work public injury. It was with great cordiality, therefore, that he asked, on behalf of those who surrounded him in the neighbourhood of Leeds, that, before any legislation took place on the question, they in that district should have what they asked for—namely, a full and searching inquiry, not only for Manchester itself, but for the whole district to which he had referred. In the event of such an inquiry taking place, he sincerely hoped that it would not be confined to Thirlmere, or to any other Lake of East Cumberland. The whole question of the permanent water supply throughout the entire North of England should be entered into; and it should be ascertained whether Manchester might not have confined itself for a water supply to the immense gathering ground afforded by the rivers and other head waters in its vicinity. If it were possible to obtain water so close at hand, such sources would be far better utilized for the purposes of Manchester than that contemplated by the Thirlmere Scheme. In conclusion, he would again cordially press upon the House the advisability of adopting the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Cumberland.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the supply of water to the manufacturing districts of Lancashire and the West of Yorkshire, and any deficiencies likely to arise therein; and, whether it is necessary or expedient to resort to the Westmoreland and Cumberland Lakes to make good any deficiencies in such supply; and, if so, to what extent, and under what conditions, such resort should be sanctioned.”—(Mr. Edward Howard.)

Mr. Wheethouse

MR. BIRLEY: I listened with great regret and no less surprise to the speech of the hon. Member for East Cumberland, who introduced the Motion. I was prepared for an attack on the Manchester Corporation and upon those who have promoted the Manchester Corporation Water Bill; but I was not prepared for an attack to be made on the Select Committee by whom the Bill was last year considered. That Committee was chosen with great care, and was, I am sure, as competent to deal with this important question as any Committee that could have been chosen by this House—I would also venture to say as competent, probably, as any Royal Commission Her Majesty's Ministers could choose for this purpose. The question of the Thirlmere Scheme was laid before the Select Committee, and their Report upon it was, I believe, adopted with singular unanimity. That unanimity was no less felt in the district which it is proposed to benefit by the scheme. A public meeting was held, according to the Statute bearing upon the question, in Manchester, to approve or disapprove of the scheme. A poll was demanded, and a poll was taken, and the result was a majority of 40,000, as against less than 3,000, in favour of a scheme which we are told is so heavily to tax the people of Manchester. Then we are told in the same breath that it is to relieve Manchester from the burden imposed on it by the failure of the present water scheme. I am free to admit that that water scheme has cost a great deal more than was originally contemplated; but I should say, from the observations of the hon. Member for East Cumberland, that he has a superficial knowledge of the subject himself. He tells us that from the present sources there is an abundant supply of water, only that the Corporation are obliged to sell it in order to raise the money to recoup the expenses. Now, the fact is, all the water that is sold is sold under statutory obligations. The Corporation of Manchester is bound to supply the neighbourhood and district. The water is readily taken, and when a dry season occurs considerable distress is felt. I submit that the question of providing an abundant supply of water to a great population is one that ought to be treated with the greatest favour by this House, owing to the necessity for it in our manufacturing districts, both for the personal wants of the population and for manufacturing purposes. This scheme, as the hon. Member has truly stated, has been enlarged by the direction of the Committee, so that it is not merely a scheme for supplying water to Manchester, but for providing the manufacturing districts of South-East Lancashire. He approves of that alteration, so does the Corporation of Manchester; therefore I would suggest to him that if he does wish the House to accept his Resolution, that he should eliminate from it everything which relates to the county of Lancaster, and content himself—probably with the approbation of the hon. and learned Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse)—with confining it to West Yorkshire—if, indeed, it should be found to be desired by that part of the country. I very much question, however, whether the West Riding does desire a Royal Commission of this kind. The Report of the Duke of Richmond's Commission is substantially carried out by the Thirlmere Scheme as it now stands. I might bring forward many other arguments to show why this Motion ought not to be passed, and I do not think that any practical purpose would be served by passing it. Of course, the wants of West Yorkshire deserve the utmost consideration. Yorkshire ought to have every opportunity of making known its requirements; but it is not the case that this Motion is really supported by West Yorkshire, and it is perfectly clear that the object is to hinder and obstruct the Manchester Scheme, at whatever cost and whatever inconvenience to a population approaching 1,000,000, in order that the æsthetic views of the hon. Member and his Friends may be respected. The views of the hon. Member are not the views of his constituents, for the people of Cumberland generally are in favour of the scheme; but there are a few persons who take views similar to the fullest extent. I believe those views are imaginary. I believe the Corporation of Manchester will be able to satisfy them that the picturesque beauty of the Lakes will not be interfered with, and that every care will be taken to preserve the natural features of the country. The principal holders of property in the district are already satisfied, and there is, in short, no real substantial objection to the Bill. I therefore think that this Motion, which is one merely hostile to the Manchester Bill, ought not to be accepted by this House.

MR. A. H. BROWN said, he was of opinion that the House should not appoint a Royal Commission as proposed. The whole question of water supply was one which deserved the attention of the House. At this moment there were before Parliament 23 Bills and 10 Provisional Orders dealing with water supply; and when he informed the House that these schemes involved an expenditure of nearly £6,000,000, the importance of the subject would be perceived. The practice of the House had been when such Bills had been read a second time to refer them to Select Committees, who dealt with them according to the evidence that came before them. One great objection to that system was that there was no uniformity in the action of those Committees. The General Acts which governed the question of water supply, though sufficient in former years, were not sufficient at the present time; and if reference were made to the Acts of 1835 and 1847, it would be found that they might now be greatly improved upon. As regards the purity of the water, for instance, it was not of such a high standard as it ought to be. Then, again, it very often happened that the Water Companies or Corporations taking powers to supply areas failed to supply portions of those areas, and thus practically created a water famine in the parts which they were bound to supply. This was a question which ought to be scrupulously investigated and guarded against in every private Water Bill. In the case of the Manchester Bill, the Committee were empowered to consider questions outside the area which the Manchester Corporation was supposed to supply; but in all the ordinary Water Bills it was impossible for the Committee to consider the water wants of any village or town which might be outside the particular area proposed to be supplied. These were matters which ought to be remedied; and he would suggest that the Chairmen of the various Committees which would be formed should have some means of laying down a uniform line of action. He desired to see some kind of uniformity with reference to these Water Bills; and if they would compare one Bill with the other, they would see that these points should receive attention, and that uniformity was required. He believed it was necessary that further provisions should be made in these Water Bills for the protection of the public. His suggestion would be that a number of experienced Members of the House should be chosen as Chairmen of the Private Bill Committees who would consider all the water schemes submitted, and that they should be formed into a panel, similar to the General Committee on Railway Bills, and by that means the House would insure that not only uniformity would be preserved, but that justice would be done. He cared very little what the remedy was to be; but he did object to the present system, which was really chaos, and anything they could do to improve it would be acceptable. He hoped in making these remarks he was not out of Order; and he made the suggestion simply that more experienced Gentlemen in the House should take the matter up and do something in the direction he had indicated. He must, however, conclude by saying that he should oppose the Motion of the hon. Member for East Cumberland.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: The House will hardly expect that the Government will be prepared to assent to the appointment of a Royal Commission on the statement which we have heard from the hon. Member who proposed the Motion. The statement he made was of a very limited character, and resolved itself into the details of what is known as the Thirlmere Water Scheme—which will, I believe, be before the House to-morrow—and the view the Committee took of that matter last year. I should have thought, in bringing such a subject forward, the hon. Member would have done so on broader grounds; that he would have attempted to show that the Lake Districts were being injured, and that the water supply of certain localities was in danger in consequence of a preference being given to certain large towns over some of their smaller neighbours, or that there was fear of a water famine in Lancashire or South Yorkshire. Indeed, I should have supposed that the hon. Member would have brought forward a case which unmistakably called for the intervention of Parliament; but in that respect he has, I consider, entirely failed. The question of a Royal Commission on the subject of water supply is a large one, and it was brought before me by an important and influential deputation in 1874, and by the Society of Arts in the early part of last year. Had the hon. Gentleman proceeded on broader grounds, and applied for a Royal Commission as a reformer in respect of water supply, and as one anxious to promote the general interests of the public, I should have been able to give information from Blue Books, as there are not only the Report of the Duke of Richmond's Committee, but in the sixth Report of the Commission on the Pollution of Rivers in 1874 there is a mass of evidence of an exhaustive character and great precision, and a number of suggestions as to a quantity of districts, all more or less bearing on this subject. There are also other Reports, and other Blue Books and Notices, having reference to water supply generally, which are open to the inspection of anyone, and are of a most valuable description. I may mention that there is a compendium, which was arranged last year at the request of the Society of Arts, which gives information as to the whereabouts of any of these Reports; and for that, among other reasons, I do not see the necessity of further special inquiries. If I had been challenged as to the grounds upon which I objected to the Motion, I should have said simply that I did not see what useful end could be gained by appointing such a Commission. The Public Health Act of 1875 greatly increased the powers of local authorities with reference to water supply, and protected them against Water Companies, and under that Act large sums of money are being borrowed for the purpose of water supply. Again, we are indebted to the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. A. H. Brown) for the Committee which sat last year, and which greatly facilitated the powers of local authorities to obtain water. That Committee, I consider, obtained ample information, and the Bill which was before them came out a good and improved measure. Having thus dealt with the general subject in the way I have mentioned, the present Motion does not commend itself to my mind, because it is not only an attack upon the Committee of last year, but it is also an attack upon the Thirlmere Water Scheme, which is to come before us on another day.

The House was not last year prejudiced in favour of that scheme. It was read a second time after ample discussion; it was referred to a Hybrid Committee; and when that Committee was appointed the whole subject was left to them. The Committee amended the Bill and reported in its favour, and it was lost in the Lords because the promoters accepted the suggestions of the Committee and embodied them in the Bill. It has now been revived, and the Manchester ratepayers have strongly supported the policy of the Corporation in bringing the subject again before the House; and the Bill, I believe, is set down for second reading to-morrow. I cannot, therefore, see what the House would gain by accepting the Motion, and thus delaying the second reading of a measure which comes to us so strongly supported. The hon. and learned Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse) went so far as to admit that there was an ample supply of water for Yorkshire itself already existing; but that is not the case at Manchester. Manchester, however, does not seek to monopolise the Lakes; but, on the contrary, a large population will be supplied by the aqueducts which carry the water. In these circumstances, I do not see that any case has been made out for a Royal Commission. Whether the Committee did all the hon. Member thinks they ought to have done or not I am not prepared to say; but if he desires to challenge the conduct of the Committee, I think he should have done so by a more specific Motion, so that the Members of the Committee might have been prepared to meet it, and might have been made aware that their conduct was under examination. It is a little unusual to make such attacks as the hon. Member has levelled at the Committee without giving the Members of it notice; and we shall be led into endless controversy if the action of every Committee is to be brought in review before the House, as has been the case here. If the Committee obeyed the instructions given to them by the House, as I must assume they did, those instructions were not very wide from what the hon. Member would give to a Royal Commission, and the House will see that the Committee did obey their instructions, because they improved the Bill in a manner acceptable to the House, and put the whole subject in a form which was still further developed in the Bill of this year. On the part of the Government, therefore, I may say that we do not feel called upon, simply upon the ground stated, to issue a Royal Commission on the subject.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, his hon. Friend (Mr. Howard) had stated his case to the House, and he (Mr. W. E. Forster) felt bound to say that on public grounds he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sclater-Booth). He (Mr. W. E. Forster) said this as one who had taken considerable interest in the water supply from Thirlmere Lake, and the question of the Lake scenery generally. He hoped his hon. Friend would not put the House to the trouble of dividing upon the question. He would not now enter into the question of whether the water could be obtained elsewhere or not; that was a point decided by the Committee; but it appeared to him that the Corporation of Manchester had consented to obligations which, if Manchester was to get water from the Lake at all, would, as far as possible, protect the Lake scenery. Looking at the matter from the point of view in which he was most interested, he did not think that any advantage could accrue from the appointment of a Royal Commission. On the other hand, he was not at all sure that even greater interference with the Lakes than had already been proposed would not be the result of such a step. It was said that care would be taken to prevent the water being taken from the Lakes, unless it were clearly shown that it could not be obtained elsewhere. But he would not like to guarantee that this Commission, or the Committees, to whom future Bills might be referred, would endorse this view of the matter. With regard to the Bill of last year, he confessed that he thought the promoters had a good case. The Hybrid Committee appointed last year gave great consideration to the subject. That Committee had come to a conclusion he regretted; but he could not deny that it was a Committee which included many able men, who fully entered into the subject, and they made certain recommendations which the promoters accepted, and it was in consequence of that that they lost their Bill in the House of Lords. He repeated he was sorry the Corporation of Manchester had set their minds upon getting water from Thirlmere; but he believed they were doing what they could to secure that as little harm as possible was done to the scenery; and, looking at the circumstances, he was unable to vote for the Motion.

MR. RAIKES said, that the hon. Member for East Cumberland was not open to censure for bringing this subject forward. His hon. Friend asked him whether it would be regular for him to move an abstract Resolution on the second reading of the Bill; and he (Mr. Raikes) pointed out the difficulty that would naturally arise if he did so. The consequence was that the Bill was read a second time after a very full and important discussion. He (Mr. Raikes) had taken an active part in the proceedings of the Hybrid Committee of last year, and he considered that no Committee was ever better constituted. His greatest difficulty, which was one of policy, was removed by the action of the Committee in depriving the Bill of the speculative character it originally possessed, and in insuring that a reasonable price was paid for the water. But he thought that the hon. Member had a perfect right to be dissatisfied with the result arrived at, and to come before the House to ask, if he deemed such a course necessary, for a Royal Commission, thus challenging the opinion of the House on the subject before the Bill that had been brought in could be read a second time. At any rate, this was a much more convenient course than if the whole question had to be raised on the Motion for the second reading. He had not the advantage, apparently possessed by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, of being familiar with the large amount of information upon this subject to which he referred; and he regretted that so much confusion should exist on this question throughout England in those districts where the different communities were fighting for the water which was to be had from the several watersheds—a rivalry that was, in reality, a great scandal. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had, however, stated that the Government would supply Members with the Rules under which, in their opinion, water supply should be regulated. It would be very convenient to

Members to be supplied with those Rules.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. RAIKES, in conclusion, advised the hon. Gentleman not to press his Motion to a division.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, he had had the honour of being Chairman of the Hybrid Committee that had sat for many weary days, and had devoted much time to the examination of this question last year. The Committee was, indeed, more like a Royal Commission than an ordinary Committee of that House. Its Members had examined the whole question in an impartial sense. They had to deal with a general meteorological fact, for the great south-western winds swept over the Atlantic and evaporated a large quantity of water on the way, while the high mountains of Westmoreland and Cumberland acted as condensers, so that the water was poured over the district in which those mountains were situated. The Committee had to consider whether the Lake regions thus formed were to be regarded as the property of one district, or whether they belonged to the whole of England, from the position in which they were placed, and the peculiar function they discharged; and, consequently, they had examined the question in its fullest and largest sense. It so happened that in the House of Lords the Bill, as it passed from that Committee, was thrown out because a Local Bill had been made into an Imperial Bill. The Duke of Richmond's Commission had examined the Bill in the same catholic spirit, and the House of Commons' Committee were, in reality, only able to ratify the decisions of that Commission. Not only had they to consider the question of the supply of other towns in Lancashire besides Manchester, but they had also to consider how all the intervening towns might benefit from the common depository of water in the Lake district. The Committee, therefore, did not restrict its labours, but examined the question most fully. Under these circumstances, he thought, considering the fact of so much time having been devoted to this question, and so much labour having been expended upon the Bill, which was not a Local Bill, but one generally affecting the great manufacturing districts of the country, that to form another Royal Commission would cast some doubt on the fulness of the labours of that Committee; and therefore he trusted the hon. Member for East Cumberland (Mr. Howard) would not press the matter to a division, but would be contented with having called attention to the subject.

MR. E. S. HOWARD wished to be allowed to state, before withdrawing his Motion, that he was very much obliged to the hon. Member for Chester (Mr. Raikes) for coming to his assistance, and saying that he had done nothing irregular; because he thought, from what the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Selater-Booth) said, he had done something which was not only irregular, but atrocious. He begged leave to withdraw the Motion.

CONSECRATION OF CHURCHYARDS

(Mr. Monk, Mr. Grantham, Mr. Forsyth.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. MONK, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that it had been conceived in a spirit of conciliation, and with the view of providing for Nonconformists in the rural parishes the same means of burial as had been provided for them in the Metropolis and in all the large towns in England and Wales. He hoped the subject would be approached in a spirit of forbearance and reasonable compromise, and he could not believe that the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) would approach it in any different spirit. If the question was to be considered one upon which compromise was impossible, he (Mr. Monk) admitted that the Bill was not worth the paper on which it was printed, and it would be better to make no further attempts to settle the question. It was brought forward in no spirit of antagonism to the hon. and learned Gentleman's measure. Indeed, he hoped to see that measure carried into law, and he had always voted for it since 1870; but the hon. and learned Gentleman must be aware that Parliament at present would not accept his Bill, and he could not expect to see it passed into law until public opinion had a more considerable effect on the votes of Members of that House. But because the hon. and learned Member could not pass his Bill, he (Mr. Monk) did not see why other hon. Members should not endeavour to provide relief, even if it were not so effectual as that provided in the larger measure of the hon. and learned Member. In 1867 the Consecration of Churchyards Act was brought into the House of Lords by the late Bishop of Winchester. The object of it was to enable Bishops to consecrate additions to existing churchyards without the formalities which, up to that time, necessarily attended consecration—namely, the attendance of the Bishop's officials, the Chancellor, the Registrar, and others; and it also repealed the stamp duties payable on the conveyance of the ground so added to the churchyard. Under that Act, consecration of the whole of the ground was compulsory; but the Act had been found to be a great boon to parishioners. His present Bill proposed that a portion of the ground, according to the necessities of the parish, might be left unconsecrated. He had seen it stated that a mere strip of the ground was to be left for the burial of Dissenters; but there was nothing in the Bill about a strip of ground, and a-half or two-thirds of it might be left unconsecrated. In this Bill it was proposed that the whole ground should be under the control of the churchwardens, and that the setting apart of any portion of the ground to remain unconsecrated should be voluntary, as it was desirable that the appropriation of the donor should be respected. Should the House adopt the Bill, it would greatly facilitate the carrying out the principle of the Burials Acts, which had been in operation for something like a quarter of a century, and under which boards were created to provide public cemeteries—part of the ground to be consecrated, and the remainder to be unconsecrated. His experience was that it was not the act of consecration which the Dissenters objected to, and he had found that the Dissenting as well as the Church members of the board were always willing to meet the Bishop, when he came to consecrate a burial-ground. His Bill, therefore, did not propose to interfere with free gifts of land; but it tended to place public burial-grounds throughout the Kingdom on the same conditions that regulated public cemeteries. He regretted that he had inserted words in the Bill separating portions of the ground by means of boundary marks of stone or iron; but he must remind the House that those were the words contained in the Burial Acts. If the House allowed the Bill to go into Committee, he would himself move the omission of the words "boundary marks of stone or iron," as a mere pathway fixing the boundary between the consecrated and unconsecrated portions was sufficient. He did that in deference to the feelings of some of his hon. Friends, who thought the provision would be objectionable to Nonconformists. He could not help remarking that the Bill had been received with unnecessary warmth by some hon. Members, the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) having even asked the House to refuse its sanction to the first reading, although last year the Bill was read a second time without a division; while, as to opposition by Churchmen, he was of opinion that there was no reason to warrant it. The principle embodied in the Bill was one that had been strongly insisted on by the late Mr. Charles Gilpin and other leading Nonconformists in 1867; and that, he thought, should be a sufficient guarantee that it would not be objectionable to those who were acting on behalf of the Nonconformists in this matter. What was the act of consecration, which seemed to arouse their susceptibilities? The act consisted only in the Bishop of the diocese signing a document reciting the conveyance of the ground, and its appropriation to the burial of the dead according to the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England, and its registration in the diocesan registry. The Bishop usually recited a psalm, offered up a few prayers, and addressed the bystanders; but these after-proceedings were by no means essential to the act of consecration itself, which was purely a formal and official affair. He held in his hands letters from the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of Peterborough, the Suffragan Bishop of Dover, who was also Archdeacon of Canterbury, and other eminent ecclesiastics, who had expressed their hearty approval of the Bill. They believed that the Bill was a useful measure, and hoped that it would receive the sanction of the House. Although it might not have any very large effect, yet he believed it would prove useful in many instances. As the law at present stood, burials took place in large towns in ground which was partly consecrated and partly unconsecrated. That arrangement had given great satisfaction, and it was the object of the Bill to afford the same relief in rural districts with regard to the necessity for having the service read by a minister of the Established Church, while provision was made for the enlargement of churchyards at a mere nominal cost. He desired to repeat most emphatically that his Bill had not been conceived in a spirit of opposition to the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire, but simply in order to provide a remedy for the grievance under which Nonconformists undoubtedly laboured. That Bill was certain to pass one day, but, until it did pass, he hoped the House would not refuse to give rural districts the relief which in large towns had proved so acceptable and satisfactory. He, therefore, begged to move the second reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Monk.)

MR. ERNEST NOEL, in moving, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, that, while admitting that the Bill was meant to be a conciliatory measure in favour of the Nonconformists and to remove the grievances under which they suffered, he thought that the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) had been successful in introducing a Bill which was equally disagreeable to all denominations. He considered it as repugnant a measure to every Liberal mind as it was possible to produce. It was one that ought to be—and, indeed, was—opposed by all Nonconformists; and it should be as repugnant to Churchmen as to Dissenters. It was in his character of a Churchman that he objected strongly to the measure, because nothing could be more dangerous to the Established Church than to offer to the Nonconformists, under the guise of a boon, that which insulted their best feelings. He could hardly imagine any hon. Gentleman sitting on the Government side of the House defending the Bill, because if the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) could be described as the thin edge of the wedge directed towards Disestablishment, this measure, though a little thinner as a wedge, was at all events a more insidious one and went in the same direction. Many hon. Members, himself among them, desired to see this question settled upon some statesmanlike compromise; but the compromise proposed by the Bill had been rejected by both sides, and it would certainly not offer any lasting solution of the difficulty. The Bill had passed a second reading last Session by the mere accident of coming on unexpectedly at a late hour of the evening towards the end of the Session, and therefore much importance could not be attached to the fact. With regard to consecration, as far as he understood the wishes of the Nonconformists, they had no objection to lie in consecrated ground; but this act of consecration was made an excuse for preventing their being buried in that ground with a service such as the people of their denomination were accustomed to. The Bill they were now asked to pass would, no doubt, allow Nonconformists to have a strip of ground where they might be buried according to their own rites; but that was in no wise what Nonconformists felt they were entitled to. They were entitled to much more than being buried with their own rites in a small strip of parish ground—a sort of pariah ground—separated from their relatives and friends, and where they would be looked upon as unholy and unclean. [Cries of "Oh!" "No, no!" and "Hear!"] He did not know how Nonconformists might regard it, but as a Churchman he so regarded it. He pointed out that though this piece of ground which they were proposing to set aside for Nonconformists was to be at one side of the churchyard, it would be within its walls; that the funeral cortege at a Nonconformist's funeral must enter by the common or lych gate, and that they would thus have what hon. Members opposite regarded with so much fear—an invasion of consecrated ground by rites other than those of the Church of England. The proposal was offensive to Churchmen also, for, in order to carry it into effect, it seemed that while the churchwarden was left to protect the unconsecrated, the clergyman was to be on guard to prevent any desecration of the consecrated precincts, by any service other than his own, and to keep the Nonconformists on their own ground. It was wrong to impose such an office on the clergyman. His main objection to the Bill was that as far as it went it would stereotype those old and painful divisions which existed in the country over the open grave, and which were so much to be deplored. Why could not Churchmen and Nonconformists alike be buried in the same old parish churchyard when there was plenty of room for them? There was no objection to the division of land in cemeteries where the ground was laid out in equal portions, and two chapels, as like as a couple of peas, were erected for the use of Churchmen and Nonconformists respectively. That was, however, very different to what was proposed here, and he should prefer to have no burial places at all except cemeteries, rather than have churchyards divided in the unprecedented manner now recommended. He could not conceive how anybody could hope to settle the matter by this Bill. He did not believe that the hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. J. G. Talbot) could support it; and he trusted that it would be rejected by the House. He did not think that it could be amended in Committee so as to meet the views of those who wanted to see a permanent settlement of the question, and for that reason would move its rejection.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Ernest Noel.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. FORSYTH said, that as his name was on the back of the Bill he wished to say a few words in its support. The speech of the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Ernest Noel) showed how vain was even the most sincere attempt to arrive at a settlement of the question by conciliation. It was but too evident that there were many Nonconformists who would not be satisfied with anything less than a total surrender on the part of Churchmen. He admitted that the Bill would not satisfy those who put their case on the high ground of principle; but he maintained that it did supply a practical remedy for a practical grievance, which to some extent prevailed. There were about 4,000 unconsecrated burial-grounds in the Kingdom, and as they did not supply the whole want, some such measure as the present was required. He respected the feelings of those Dissenters who wished to be buried in the parish churchyard, hallowed in their minds by so many old associations in connection with their ancestors who were buried there. If the Bill passed, additions might gradually be made to all the consecrated churchyards, surrounded by the same walls, in which Nonconformists could be buried with their own religious ceremonies, while the consecrated ground appropriated to the Church would not be interfered with. What objection could there be to trying the proposal as an experiment until some better solution of the question could be arrived at? There was no hope of the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) being passed by the present Parliament, and probably it would not be passed by the next—possibly by no Parliament at all. The present Bill was undoubtedly a step in the right direction, and it would leave the main question entirely open. Its effect would be to diminish the inconvenience that Nonconformists were subject to at present in having either to submit to have the Burial Service of the Church of England read over them, or to be conveyed many miles to the nearest cemetery. The practical result of the measure would be to extend to the churchyards the principle adopted in all cemeteries—of dividing the land into two parts, one consecrated and the other not. Dissenters had not originally objected to this division in cemeteries, and why should they in the churchyards? He was, however, sorry to see that some of them had lately protested against such a division as invidious and improper. If Nonconformists rejected this Bill, it would be fair to assume that they did not so much desire to have their practical grievance redressed as to secure a triumph over the Established Church. He believed that Dissenters and Churchmen, also, would be willing to give ground to be added to churchyards, and thus eventually the greater part, if not the whole, of what the Dissenters now demanded would be obtained. The Bill required or implied that a portion of the ground to be given should be consecrated; but he should like that provision to be altered, and it might be amended in Committee, so that no part of the ground given by Dissenters need be consecrated. He commended the Bill to the attention of the House, because it was a step in the right direction, and met a practical want in a practical manner, without offending what some might call religious prejudices, but which he (Mr. Forsyth) believed were sincere and conscientious convictions.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN considered that of the six Bills which had been introduced during the present Session to settle the Burials Question this measure was incomparably the worst, and his only regret was that any hon. Member sitting upon the Liberal Benches should have been found to introduce it. It was some consolation, however, to find that his hon. Friend (Mr. Monk) could not get a single Liberal Member to back his Bill, and that he was obliged to seek that assistance within the ranks of the enemy. He could not help thinking that that opinion was shared also by the constituents of his hon. Friend, because he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) had read a correspondence purporting to emanate from the whole of the Liberal voters and Nonconformists of Gloucester, in which they spoke of the Bill in no measured terms. The Bill proposed in new churchyards to rail off by boundary marks of stone or iron a Dissenters' corner, just as there used to be a suicides' corner. The Bishops were to be the judges of the size of the corner. He was not a Nonconformist, but if he were, he should regard such a proposal as a deliberate insult. It was no answer to say that such a solution had been accepted by Nonconformists 12 years ago, for many things which might have been accepted as concessions then would be resented as insults now. As to the proposed introduction in the country of the cemetery system, so far from that being a recommendation of the measure, it was to him its objectionable feature. He detested the cemetery system. It divided members of families who in death ought not to be divided, and was a disgrace to England and to Christianity. Last year he had mentioned the case of a Nonconformist widower at Birmingham, who, having interred one of his wives in the Church of England cemetery, and another in the Roman Catholic cemetery, was compelled to purchase a third grave for himself in the Nonconformist cemetery. Was not such a system a disgrace to their country? He was taunted with refusing to accept a compromise; but his position being perfectly clear and defined, and having for its basis the common-law rights of all parishioners to interment in the churchyards, it was not to be expected that he could support such a pitiful makeshift as the measure now before the House. It would be impossible to invent any weapon more deadly to the Church of England than the opposition which had been offered to his (Mr. Osborne Morgan's) Bill, and the attempt to substitute for it this miserable stop-gap. It seemed to be the determination of hon. Gentlemen opposite to make this a hustings' question, and to fight it out to the bitter end, for they had met all his efforts to settle it with a stubborn non possumus. On his side there could be no misgiving, for upon it he had common sense, justice, and humanity; and he felt sure that while the responsibility of the struggle would rest with hon. Gentlemen opposite, the victory would be with him.

MR. GREGORY said, that the number of Bills which had been introduced during the present Session on the subject showed that there was a desire in favour of some settlement of it, and he thought the proposal of the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) formed a basis on which some conclusions might be arrived at by those who could not accept the settlement supported by the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Osborne Morgan). He did not approach the measure in any spirit of antagonism to the Nonconformists of the country, and it was in that mood that he ventured to support it. He knew of a case in point in which the system proposed by the Bill worked admirably. He was in the habit of attending a church in the country, where a portion of the churchyard was unconsecrated. It was inclosed within the churchyard wall, and formed an integral part of the churchyard. He could point out no distinction between that portion of the ground and the rest of the graveyard, and any distinction between them was only known, perhaps, to the clergyman and one or two other persons. It was open to the Nonconformists to avail themselves of that place for the burial of their dead with their own services. That was the arrangement proposed under the Bill, and there appeared to be no substantial difficulty in carrying out the proposal which it contained. No doubt, many persons would be willing to avail themselves of the provisions of the measure, and make grants of land for churchyards in their neighbourhood. There would be no distinction to the eye between one portion of the churchyard and the other; and he denied that it was any insult to the Nonconformist bodies to offer to allow them to enter an integral part of the churchyard, and use it in that manner for the interment of their deceased friends and relations.

MR. WALTER opposed the Bill. He disputed it as being in any sense a settlement of the question, and thought the remarks of his hon. Friend who had just sat down (Mr. Gregory) told rather against than in favour of its principles. His hon. Friend had described the division of a churchyard in a remarkable manner, inasmuch as within its precincts the funerals of Dissenters were conducted without let or hindrance. There was, his hon. Friend said, no visible distinction between the one portion of the churchyard and the other, and no stranger entering that churchyard would know what portion was consecrated and what was unconsecrated. He (Mr. Walter) presumed there was no more difference between the two than between the dust of Dissenters and that of Churchmen. If that case proved anything, it proved the utter absurdity of the present rule. If it was possible, in the circumstances which his hon. Friend had described, for Churchmen and Dissenters to be buried within the precincts of the same churchyard without let or hindrance, without the parishioners being aware that one part of the ground was different from the rest, why should not the same be the rule for the whole Kingdom? Then, how did his hon. Friend know that the old churchyards were consecrated at all? That was very questionable. It was doubtful whether there were any records of anything of the kind. But the great objection to that Bill as it stood was that it belonged to that most objectionable class of Bills of which they had had too many of late—namely, Permissive Bills. Whatever might fairly be the subject of permissive measures, there was one matter which he thought ought never to be so, and that was the law which regulated the burials of the people of this country. There was nothing permissive about death. A man must die, and the arrangements for his interment ought not to depend on permissive legislation, but on some broad and national principles. Since he first began to consider that question, it had seemed to him possible to solve it only in one way—namely, by recognizing the right of interment as a civil right, and letting the religious rites performed over the deceased follow the religious opinion of his friends. He could see no other rational mode of settling the question. A man must be buried somewhere. Granting that he must have a place of interment, and granting also that which could not be denied, that the common law had so far overridden the law of consecration—whatever that law might be—as to entitle every parishioner to be buried in his parish churchyard, it seemed to be only a matter of good feeling as well as common sense and justice that the funeral rites of the deceased should be in accordance, not with the rule of the Church and the opinions of the clergyman, but with the opinion of his friends. It was strange that while people detected so many gnats in that controversy they did not appear to see the real camels before them. The real difficulty was not so much the place of interment, as the strain which was put on the consciences of so many clergymen in being compelled to read the Burial Service of the Church of England over everybody indiscriminately. Two or three days after the last discussion on that subject he went home to his parish in the country, and the first person he met was the clergyman. “Why,” said the reverend gentleman—“Old So-and-so is dead; he succeeded at last in drinking himself to death,” referring to an old notorious drunkard who made no secret of his intention to drink himself to death. On that he remarked—“And you will have to bury him.” The clergyman replied—“That is true; but I cannot help it.” And he had to read the Burial Service over such a notorious drunkard as that, who had drank his life away. That grievance remained. How it was to be remedied was a difficult question; but in comparison with a grievance of that kind all those miserable squabbles about consecrated and unconsecrated ground, and whether Dissenters were to have a service of their own choosing read over their graves, were paltry and insignificant. As to the question of consecrated ground, had they thought what it amounted to? Whoever had found any such difficulty in regard to the case of persons who died at sea? It might be said that the sea was a different element from the land. Well, let them take the case of those who fell at Waterloo, Sadowa, or any other battle-field. Was it not the fact that the funeral service for Churchmen and Dissenters was read by their respective ministers over their common grave without any form of consecration having been gone through over the soil where they were buried? And why in the case of a churchyard was that form of consecration, which meant nothing more than that the soil was set apart for the interment of the dead and was not to be disturbed, to be so interpreted as if it constituted an eternal barrier between Churchmen and Dissenters after death as well as before it? He could not consent, then, to vote for the second reading of that Bill. As one of those who had given a piece of land for a churchyard, he confessed that under that Bill he could not—he should be ashamed to add to it another field, or any part of a field of his to form the unconsecrated corner of that burial-ground. He saw no sound objection to Nonconformist ministers entering the parish churchyard and reading their own burial service over the graves of deceased members of their congregations.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, he had never addressed the House on this question before; one reason being that there was nothing new to say, the other being that the matter had now passed away from the region of argument to that of mere pride and prejudice. When they were attacked for not wishing to compromise they were just simply being attacked for being logical and consistent. There could be no compromise in this matter, for it was impossible to divide a principle. If the principle entertained by himself and others was correct, that everybody had a right to interment in the churchyard, they could not consistently compromise the matter by retreating from the position they held—that the right of using their own ceremonies must also be conceded to those who were by the law of nature compelled to come to the churchyard sooner or later. There were only two compromises which he could suggest as meeting the point at issue. One would be a Bill to dispense Dissenters from the necessity of dying. No doubt, that would be very satisfactory to the Dissenters, but he was afraid it would be ultra vires. But if they could not relieve Nonconformists from paying the debt of nature they might, perhaps, relieve everybody from the necessity of being buried, by a Bill providing that they should all be cremated. Perhaps some hon. Members opposite would propose this. But, seriously, he deprecated these frequent discussions, because they were painful and often very mischievous. The Bills of this character which were brought in were trying to evade the question, not to settle it, and he condemned more than any other the Bill then before them as being the worst that had as yet been proposed, and as one that sought to settle the difficulty by aggravating it. The promoters of this measure were not content with perpetuating distinctions at the grave side. They would maintain them long after the grave was closed, and even the generation had passed away. In Ireland Roman Catholics and Protestants were buried side by side by the ministers of their own denominations without any difficulty arising, and why should not the same thing be done in England? He hoped before many years were over this question would be settled on the only basis—namely, that of the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbighshire. If this became a hustings' question, he, for one, would not fear the result.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I regret most sincerely that the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) is about to oppose the Bill, and that, as it appears to me, his opposition is based upon most intolerant grounds. I have served with him for many years in this House, and have known him, I may say, from boyhood; I sincerely regret that he should have uttered it, for I cannot conceive of a more intolerant speech than his, unless it be the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan). It is my intention to vote for the second reading of the Bill on the same ground that I most anxiously supported the Cemeteries Act—because the Bill proposes in nothing to violate the common-law right of the Church of England, as a denomination, but, on the contrary, recognizes that common-law right. Every parishioner has a right to be buried in the churchyard, if he be a Churchman, or one who respects the Services of the Church of England. Parishioners have no right in the churchyard, except as the yard of the church belonging to the denomination called members of the Church of England. To say they have no other right whatever, and never had any right, that is a bold assertion, which is only a half truth; but to assert that everyone has a right amounts to a statement absolutely false, for I deny that any man has any right whatever by common law to interment in the churchyard, according to any other ceremonies or rites than those of the Church of England. It is the performance of those ceremonies and those rites which constitute the common-law proof, and recognition, of the title. With regard to the feeling in favour of the Services of the Church of England, I must say, for my part, that I value the Burial Service for its tolerance. The hon. Member for Berkshire said that he met his own clergyman one day, and wished him joy of having to read that Service over a neighbour, of whose past life neither approved—and that the clergyman, who seems to have had but little charity, expressed his difficulty in performing the Service in such a case. This is the very kind of intolerance that I detest, because what is the substance and the tenour of the Burial Service? Is it not the expression of a fervent hope that Almighty God has pardoned the sins of the departed, and received him into eternal rest? I cannot help saying that a clergyman who hesitates to read the Burial Service in a case where no objection is made on the part of the friends of the deceased is open to the charge of a presumptuous intolerance which is unworthy of civilization. I repeat that I value the Services of the Church of England, but still I would not force them upon anyone who has a conscientious objection to them. I would do my utmost to respect the conscientious feelings of all persons who

entertain such objections, however much mistaken I may think them. Therefore, I would make provision to meet their difficulty, and that is done in the present Bill without invalidating the common-law right with regard to the churchyards. I honour the feeling which makes a man wish to be buried near the old church of his parish. When I say that I vote for the second reading of the Bill moved by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Monk), because he respects the feeling to which I have just referred, and proposes to give effect to it, without violating the common-law right and title of the Church of England, as a denomination, I put it simply as a civil matter, and maintain that we have no right or title by use and custom to the churchyards capable of proof, except through the condition that the Service of the Church shall be performed there. That is the necessary proof of our right. The vice of the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire is that it strikes at the very root of the common-law title of the Church; it would dispossess the majority in order to benefit the minority; whereas the Bill of the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) suggests a plan whereby we may preserve the title of the Church as a denomination, while respecting the conscientious feelings of those who, though they have separated from the Church, still feel a veneration for her. The Bill may need alteration in Committee; but I am convinced that it is a step in the right direction. The hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire said he hated the Cemeteries Act. Well, I differ from him totally on this, for I laboured in support of the passing of that Act, and I think of all measures it is one of the most tolerant. I worked in order to obtain the passing of the Cemeteries Act, and I saw it passed into law. It is an Act which respects the feelings of everyone—the feelings of Nonconformists not less than those of members of the Church of England. That was a thoroughly tolerant measure, and I am sorry that the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire distinctly marks the progress of this agitation towards intolerance. I detest intolerance. There is no greater intolerance than an attempt to invade the civil rights of a great denomination, simply because it cannot, consistently with security of the possession of the trust property it holds, accommodate itself to every suggested means for satisfying the scruples of others who form no part of that denomination. The Bill of the hon. Member for Gloucester is a tolerant measure; it may need amendment in detail, but its principle recognizes the dignity, which ought always to be considered, as attached to every question which affects the religious feelings of the people. I shall certainly vote for the second reading of the Bill.

MR. HIBBERT said, he had, as a Churchman, always supported the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan); at the same time, not desiring to offend the feelings of Churchmen on this question, he would not use strong language, but when he looked at the Bill of the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk), he was bound to say that it was neither a compromise, nor would it lead to a settlement of the question. In the first place, it was merely a permissive Bill, capable of being worked only in a limited number of parishes, for there were hundreds, he might say thousands, of small parishes in the country where no landowner was likely to be found willing or able to give land in the way indicated by that Bill. The measure was, therefore, no answer to the demand of the Nonconformist bodies. In the second place, the Bill also seemed to make a distinction between members of the Church of England and members of Nonconformist bodies, for the latter were to be given a small strip of land adjoining the churchyard. In the majority of cases, the funerals of Nonconformists would have to enter the gate and pass through the churchyard in order to enter the unconsecrated ground set apart for them; and that being so, he asked whether it was not fighting for a shadow to oppose the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend? It was a question admitting of no compromise, and this House had had set before it by the House of Lords an example of the way in which it would be treated. Instead of finding fault with Nonconformists for wishing to be buried in the parish churchyard, Churchmen ought rather to be pleased that they were ready to give up their conscientious objections and allow their dead to be interred there. After all, what was that rite of consecration? Some Bishops said it was one thing, and others said it was another. Speaking as a Churchman, he could not see that there was the least difference in principle between allowing the Nonconformists to go to a piece of ground to be added to the churchyard under a Bill of that kind and giving them access to the burial places now surrounding their parish churches. The present Bill would not settle that question, and therefore he must vote against it. He thought the Government, in whose hands the question had been left for the last few Sessions, should give the House their views on it.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, the impression which that debate had given him all throughout was that on the other side there had been singular weakness. He did not mean weakness of language, for he had never known so much unmitigated use of strong adjectives as had been indulged in by the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan), who had uttered the adjective "miserable" half-a-dozen times in as many consecutive sentences. What was all that fume and fret about? They were simply asked to pass a Bill which would allow a man to make an innocent use of his own property for the chance of other people liking to avail themselves of his gift. If it had been intended to compel landlords to give land for the burial of Dissenters, or to send the parish constable to seize the corpse of a Nonconformist and carry it, vi et armis, and the living minister too, to the graveyard, and to compel the minister to use the Church Service there, the vehemence with which the Bill had been opposed could hardly have been exceeded. It had even been made a complaint against it that it was not a Party measure, because it was backed by Members on both sides of the House. Surely a question about the burial of the dead was one into which no feelings but those of religion, humanity, and order should enter; and yet it was now made a matter depending on this or that side of the House. Why was the Bill to be rejected because it had the singular good fortune to be supported by hon. Members sitting on both sides? He might himself have used that argument a week ago, but he should have scorned to do so. He left the other side to do that, and he congratulated them on the true Liberalism of their sentiments. This was a purely permissive

Bill. The Church was an established one, and it accordingly existed under regulation. The duties of the clergy were more or less regulated by Statute; the churchyards were regulated by Statute. There were certain limitations on those churchyards. That Bill merely proposed to relax those limitations for the advantage of the whole community. On the one hand, they had men willing and able to give the land, and on the other, ecclesiastical authorities were willing and able to second them in their intention, which was only impeded by the limitations of a very recent Statute. Why not let the Bill be read the second time? Why not indulge those who desired to help in appeasing the burials' agitation in the hope that something might now be done? Why not reserve to themselves in grim silence the satisfaction of seeing that Bill prove a failure in its working hereafter? That would be common sense. But hon. Gentlemen opposite showed that they were nursing the question up for the hustings. The position of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire reminded him (Mr. Beresford Hope) of the old story of the squire who asked a friend out to shoot with him. The snipe rose, up went the friend's gun, and down went the snipe. "Good heavens!" exclaimed the squire, "what have you done? You have spoilt my sport—you have killed my snipe!" The Burials Question was the snipe of the other side, and especially of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire. If it were settled, the hon. and learned Member would, no doubt, be free to devote his learning, ability, and industry to those general questions which he was so well able to handle, but his snipe would be killed. Where, then, would be the Dissenting clergy of the mountains, of old Wales? He asked the House to rise above Party and do a generous thing by assenting to a Bill which might do some good, and certainly could do no harm. It would at least be an innocent Act on the Statute Book—a good deal more than could be said for a great many other portions of their legislation.

MR. RICHARD: I have so frequently spoken here on this Burials Question, and the objections to the present Bill have been so well stated by previous speakers, that it will not be necessary for me to trespass on the attention of the House for more than a few minutes. I was rather glad to hear the protest of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) against the use of strong language. I hope he will take the lesson home to himself; for, of all those who take part in these discussions, no one employs such energetic and emphatic epithets as he does. I am quite at a loss to understand what could have prompted my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) to bring forward this Bill, and to press it forward against the declared wishes of those more immediately concerned, and against the earnest remonstrances of his own political Friends. He declares himself in favour of the Bill of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan), and has, in fact, constantly and consistently voted for it for seven successive Sessions of Parliament. But now that the principle of that Bill has been affirmed by a considerable majority of the House of Lords, and would have been affirmed in this House last week if the opponents of the Bill of the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. Balfour) had not been afraid of submitting to the test of a vote, when everything is thus so well proceeding in the direction which the whole Liberal Party desires, my hon. Friend comes and trails his little red-herring across our path. This Bill is not only utterly inadequate as a settlement of the question, but it is in direct contravention of the essential principle of the Bill of my hon. and learned Friend; for whereas the latter seeks to remove the disabilities under which the Nonconformists now labour, this Bill distinctly, and even offensively, perpetuates them by still excluding Dissenters from being buried in consecrated ground, even though it be within the same walls as the other. I am quite sure it was not the intention of my hon. Friend to put an affront upon the Nonconformists; but the effect of his Bill will undoubtedly be to place them in a most invidious and humiliating position by banishing them from the common resting-place of their fellow-parishioners, as though they were something common and unclean, and relegating them to a spot which would, no doubt, come to be called the Dissenters' corner. Of course, in thousands of parishes it would be wholly inoperative, for there are thousands of churchyards in the rural districts which would require no enlargement and would receive no enlargement; while, as respects the thousands and tens of thousands of Dissenting families whose relatives are already buried in churchyards, it would either oblige them to be separated in death from their nearest and dearest kindred, or submit, as now, to be buried as members of the Church of England. Then, as has already been remarked, it would introduce into our churchyards the offensive distinction between consecrated and unconsecrated ground. I am glad to see the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary in his place, for I remember when, 10 years ago, I had the honour of sitting on the same Committee with him upstairs—the Committee to which the Bill of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbighshire was referred—he expressed with great emphasis his disapproval of this distinction as it exists in our cemeteries. With regard to consecration, I think I can explain the views of Nonconformists in a sentence. A great Christian teacher in the Primitive Church was asked his opinion in a case of conscience, as to whether Christian converts might eat of meat that had been offered to idols. His answer was—"Certainly you may, if you have no scruple about the matter yourselves, for," he added, "an idol is nothing at all." I do not wish to say anything offensive to the feelings of hon. Gentlemen opposite; if they attach any significance or sacredness to the act of consecration, I entirely respect their feelings; but to us Nonconformists consecration "is nothing at all." We have not the smallest objection to be buried in what is called consecrated ground; for, in fact, the whole purpose and design of the Bill of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbighshire is to secure permission for us to bury our dead in consecrated ground with such forms and rites as are in harmony with our feelings. This insistence upon keeping a distinction between Churchmen and Dissenters in death betokens a state of mind which is to me absolutely inexplicable. Some time ago we had a declaration circulated amongst us signed by a considerable number of noblemen, gentlemen, and clergymen—I observed, indeed, that nearly one-half of them were clergymen—in which they said in effect that, having given bits of ground for purposes of interment, if they had thought it possible that the time would ever come when the ground so given would be profaned by the foot of any Christian minister except one episcopally ordained, or when the air floating above it would vibrate to the voice of prayer and praise from any but sacerdotal lips, they would never have given those bits of ground at all. I sometimes wonder what such people think of the life to come. I suppose they will insist upon having a corner of Heaven to themselves, free from the intrusion of all vulgar Dissenters, railed off, as my hon. Friend proposes to do with the churchyards, by boundaries of stone or iron, where they could sit in solitary grandeur, singing their own psalms, presided over by their own Archbishops and Bishops in lawn sleeves. My hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester admits that his Bill, even if passed into law, would not settle the question. But the settlement of the question once for all is surely what everybody must desire. Does he think it would be wise to try to patch up the difficulty by a small measure of this sort, leaving the grievance complained of practically unredressed, and rendering further agitation necessary for its removal? For this reason, if for no other, I would oppose the Bill, because it leaves open a question which breeds so much irritation and animosity.

Mr. J. G. HUBBARD said, that some hon. Gentlemen opposite professed to be the friends of religious liberty, yet they seemed to think that religious equality ought to be secured only for those who were dissentients from the Established Church; but he wished to uphold the right of Churchmen to religious liberty. As Churchmen, they had a religious system of their own, and they had a right to practise their own religion and their own ceremonial according to the laws of their own Church. The proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire conflicted with their religious convictions, and impaired the security of the religious system to which they were attached. He admitted that this Bill would not settle the question; but why would it not settle it? Because the question was really one of religious equality—of the Disestablishment of the Church with all its consequences—and everybody must know that the Bill would not settle that. Still, to whatever degree the Bill might operate, it must have the effect of mitigating the difficulty of the present position. He could not understand, indeed, why the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire should have become so exceedingly infuriated against this very harmless measure, unless it was because he thought it would cut away the position which he held in the House; but he did not believe it would have that effect, for so long as there was a Church in this free country there would be always some agitation, and he did not regret the wholesome exercise of it. The hon. and learned Member contended that every parishioner had the right to be buried in the churchyard, and with the ceremonial of the religious body to which he belonged. [Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN: I said he ought to have the right.] Every parishioner had a right to join in the services of the parish church; but if he chose to join any one of the 161 sects which existed in this country, it surely would not be contended that he had the right to worship in the parish church with the ceremonial of the seceders he had joined? If such a right were allowed and exercised, utter confusion and chaos would be the result. He maintained that the arguments which would disestablish the churchyards would logically disestablish the Church. This consequence was denied as improbable, and he concurred in that opinion, for mankind were not logical; but they, as legislators and statesmen, should be logical, and not yield to arguments which would carry them on to measures which they now repudiated. They could not separate the church from the churchyard. Together they made the portion of the parish which had been placed in the custody of the clergyman. No doubt it belonged to the nation, but it was to the nation in its religious character. Churchmen had great respect for their consecrated buildings and consecrated grounds. They looked upon the dead in the churchyards as lying there till the Day of Resurrection, and they naturally objected to throwing open either their churches or their churchyards to those who disbelieved the Resurrection, and who would do in their churchyards what was done the other day at Berlin. There, not long ago, the body of a Socialist was accompanied to the grave by 10,000 people, and was interred in a cemetery of the Free Congregation, over the portals of which was the inscription—"There is no hereafter, and no meeting again." He asked that Christians should not be exposed to the indignity which they would suffer, if all persons, whether believers or unbelievers, had unrestrained freedom of access to their consecrated churchyards. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Clackmannanshire (Mr. Adam), who made a kind of political progress last summer in the Northern counties of Scotland, whilst informing his countrymen of the many enormities of the Burial Laws of England, said—

"Though you may be loth to believe such a very shocking thing, it is the case that in English churchyards burials are refused to those not of the same denominations as the Church of England."

He was surprised that the political conductor of the Party opposite should give such inaccurate information to the highly intelligent and educated people of Scotland. He took the opportunity of writing to The Scotsman, to explain that the English burial law did nothing of the kind. The law of England enjoined Christian burial to every Christian, whatever his denomination. If any difficulty was raised on the subject it was by the friends of the deceased, for the Church, in her charity, asked no questions and withheld the Service prepared for the burial of departed Christians only where the departed had not been christened. This erroneous exposition of the Burials Law by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adam) was accompanied by his declared adoption, in the name of the Liberal Party, of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire's (Mr. Osborne Morgan's) Burials Bill—a declaration the more ominous when they knew that the Bill of the hon. and learned Member was admitted to be the first step towards the acquirement of religious equality, to be evidenced in the Disestablishment of the Church of Scotland, and to be followed, when quite prepared, by the Disestablishment of the Church of England. Such was the programme, to the overture of which, in the Burials Bill, the Liberal Party were invited through the lips of the Liberal Whip. It might be useful to have some sensational rallying cry; but he trusted the great Liberal Party might find some nobler, some more patriotic and generous object for which to unite, than an attack on that Constitution, to which they owed, in its growth of centuries, not only their power and their wealth, but their religion and freedom as a people.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. J. G. Hubbard) seemed to suppose that the right hon. Member for Clackmannanshire (Mr. Adam) made a most extraordinary statement when he asserted that, according to the present Burial Laws of England, a clergyman might, and sometimes did, refuse to bury persons who considered themselves and were supposed to be Christians.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, the right hon. Member for Clackmannanshire did not speak about what an individual could do, but the law.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, it appeared to him that, according to the law, an incumbent had the right to refuse burial to persons who were unbaptized.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, the words used by the right hon. Member for Clackmannanshire were that burial could be "refused to those who were not of the same denomination as the Church of England."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he did not suppose the right hon. Gentleman really wished to dwell upon that mode of putting the case. What the right hon. Member for Clackmannanshire doubtless meant to say was that burial could be refused to unbaptized persons. Such a statement appeared to him to be strictly true, and, no doubt, any Scotchman would be surprised to hear that such a law existed in this country. Another statement was that if the parish graveyard was thrown open to Dissenters it was a necessary and logical consequence that the Dissenters would acquire the same right over the churches. This was an argument which the defenders of the Church ought to be wiser than to use, for it might be used against the Church hereafter. He was himself surprised at the persistency with which that argument was raised, and that it should not be admitted, after all, that there was some difference between the freedom which it was possible to exercise in regard to a place of worship and a place of sepulchre. The question had been debated as if it was not going to be settled soon, whereas everyone knew that it must be settled very soon, and that that settlement would proceed on the lines of what the House of Lords had already agreed to, and what there was every reason to believe the great dignitaries of the Church had also agreed to. The question would never be satisfactorily settled until a clergyman was prevented from refusing the right of burial to anyone with such services as accorded with the convictions which the person had entertained during life. Such a settlement would come, if not before the next General Election, certainly immediately after it. He hoped the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) would consider the course which the debate had taken, and withdraw his Bill. The hon. Member, he was sure, had brought forward this Bill believing it would do some good and no harm, while it would tend to remove unpleasantness in some places, and that, at any rate, it was not a foe to the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire, which he himself supported; but he (Mr. W. E. Forster) thought what had been said on the other side of the House would tend to show him that such was not the case, and that the proposal was really in direct opposition to some of the fundamental principles of the measure his hon. Friend supported. The objections to the present law were based on both right and feeling. The Dissenters considered that they had a right to burial in the churchyards, and that that right carried with it the right to be buried with their own services. As a matter of feeling, Dissenters thought they ought to be allowed to rest alongside of their Church relations. To neither of these claims did this Bill offer any respect; indeed, the hon. Member must be convinced, from the arguments by which his Bill had been supported from the other side, that it was opposed to the principles which he himself had at other times advocated. As for the cemetery system, he regarded it as a disgrace to a people who were supposed to desire Christian brotherhood, and altogether the situation was such that he had expected some statement would be made on behalf of the Government, and was disappointed that none had been given.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I must apologize for having been detained from the House by Public Business during the early part of the afternoon. I have, however, heard the speeches of the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil (Mr. Richard), and those who followed him, and I wish to say a few words on the subject under consideration. I do not quite appreciate the humiliation of which he spoke. I do not understand that those who do not belong to the Church of England feel any humiliation at their friends being buried in unconsecrated parts of cemeteries; nor, therefore, do I believe that there would not be a large majority of Dissenters who would not to some extent feel conciliated if ground were provided in which they could bury their dead with their own services. For my part, however, I never pass a cemetery anywhere without feeling the deepest possible regret at seeing that in this Christian country we are obliged to have three chapels in every public burial-ground. I am not ashamed to state that in the House, and should not be elsewhere. At the same time, the system has worked without much difficulty so far, and I believe has received a certain amount of general acceptance, and will, I presume, continue. I do not quite understand, however, why there should not be both consecrated and unconsecrated ground. It seems to be the very height of ecclesiastical tyranny to say that, because you do not care to have consecrated ground for burials, those who do care for it should not be allowed to have it. And if there is to be consecrated ground in the future, as well as in the past, there must, of course, be a distinction between the burial-places of those who take one view on this point, and those who take the opposite. In that light, the question is in the broadest possible way one of religious freedom. A practice has, I believe, been very long in force in a very large section of the Christian Church—namely, that of consecrating, not the churchyard itself, but the graves; and I have never yet heard of any satisfactory reason why this should not be done in the churchyards of other denominations. Moreover, I am not one of those who think that the presence of a Bishop is necessary to consecration, there being no reason why the ceremony should not be conducted by the parish clergyman. That is allowed in the Church of Rome. All, however, that I want to enforce in connection with this part of the question is, that those who say that there is a broad distinction between consecrated and unconsecrated ground must, in order to avoid being guilty of religious tyranny, allow us to have consecrated ground, the logical result being that all cannot be buried in the same piece of ground. The right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken conveyed to this House an incorrect impression of the law on the subject of burial in parish churchyards, for he stated that there were certain classes of persons who differed from the Church of England—those who are unbaptized, for instance—and who are not entitled to burial in a parish churchyard. That is not so. The law, as I take it, says that every person has a right to be buried in the churchyard of the parish in which he has died; and only when we come to the question of the clergyman of the Church of England reading the Service of the Church over the grave does the law step in. The law says that over unbaptized persons, excommunicated persons, and those who have laid violent hands on themselves, the Service of the Church shall not be read. [Mr. W. E. FORSTER: There shall be no service.] No service, of course. As for the statement that those who oppose the Nonconformist demand fear that to admit it would be to make way for the Disestablishment of the Church, I have never heard that fear expressed by my hon. Friends; but what I understand them to say is, that Disestablishment is the avowed object of the Liberation Society in agitating the Burials Question. Of course, hon. Gentlemen on this side are quite entitled to use the argument in question without being bound to support Disestablishment, should any change be made in the Burial Laws. If any grievance at all arises from the present laws, it is this—and I admit that it is a substantial grievance—that there is no power of any kind or description in anybody to enforce the making of a burial-ground where one is needed. In making any change you ought not to provide simply for the present, but also for the future. There is no doubt that a very large proportion of the churchyards scattered up and down England will, in the course of perhaps the next 10 years, be closed, and in all the parishes with which they are connected the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) would have no effect whatever. There is an instance of this in Northampton. There, all the churchyards are closed; and when the people met, as they were bound to do, to consider this state of affairs, they decided to have no burial board, and, therefore, to have no burial ground; and the only satisfaction which remains to the people of Northampton lies in the fact that there is at that place a cemetery which belongs to persons differing from the Church of England. I think that a state of the law which produces such a result ought not to be allowed to exist. One outcome of it is that the Church of England has provided of its own free gift, from time to time, and especially during the last 100 years, burial-grounds all over the country, or at least in a great number of parishes, thus supplying a want which the law of England of itself did not supply. Hon. Members opposite have often alluded to the law of Scotland as entirely in their favour, and as a reason why we should make a change in the present case; but if the law of England were the same I should be perfectly content. But that is not the case. In Scotland the burial-grounds are the property of heritors, and, oftener than not, they are away from the church instead of being near it. How do the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire and his Friends propose to proceed? They pass over the real grievance which I have pointed out, and proceed in a totally different way. Some time ago they were bound, like everybody else, to pay church rates; but these were abolished, even as concerned churchyards. At that time they said—“No, we don't want the churchyards, and we won't pay the rates for them.” But the moment the latter part of their declaration is acceded to they come to this House and say that now they have got rid of the burden of paying rates they must have their rights in the churchyards again. That is, I think, proceeding on a wrong principle. I find fault equally with all the Bills which have been brought before the House on this question, for not one of them proposes to provide a burial-place in every part of England. They all, in fact, come to this—“Here is an apple. So long as there is any apple left we will eat it; but we make no provision for any other apple for the persons coming after us." The first principle that ought to be dealt with in this matter is that any law amending the law of burial should enact that there should be burial-places in every part of England, not necessarily, however, in every parish. No one of the half-dozen Bills before the House touched that point, and for that reason I deem them all unsatisfactory. The Bill presented by the Government proceeded in that direction, for it provided that there should be a burial-ground provided convenient for every person to be buried in. You would find that, starting from this point, you could make very much better provision for the intermediate stage during which the existing churchyards could be used without injuring the consciences of those who are at present interested in them. See for one moment what the result of any of the Bills which we have before us would be! If one of them were passed, its effect would be to allow any religious body but the Church of England to have burial-grounds where its own religious services might be exclusively used, while the Church alone would not be allowed to provide at her own expense a burial-ground exclusively for the use of her own people. That, I think, would be a grievance, and I cannot think that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbighshire would press his demand to that point. Let every person, I say, be buried with the services which he or his friends like. That would not, however, be the case if the law said that the Church of England, as the Established Church of the country, were bound to provide burial-grounds, both consecrated and unconsecrated, for everybody. Surely, in altering the law we ought to consider, as far as possible, the conscientious scruples of Churchmen as well as of Dissenters; and though you may think them foolish you are not entitled to deny the fact that those conscientious scruples exist. Therefore, we ought to be as tender as possible in trying to get rid of what they consider a grievance, instead of doing it as roughly as we can. For the sake of argument, I am not denying the Nonconformist grievance; but I do not hesitate to say that the House could not inflict a greater blow at the conscientious scruples of the Laity as well as Clergy of the Church than by carrying the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire. Then, what are we to do with the Bill of the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk)? It certainly does not meet my view. The really important provision to which I have just alluded as being desirable was embodied in the Government measure brought forward some time ago; and I cannot help thinking that when it is made the groundwork of legislation, as I hope it will be, there will not be so much difficulty in making provision for the intermediate stage—which will be practically the only difficulty—in the work of giving a burial-ground to every part of the country. This Bill does not do that. It is entirely permissive, and I am rather surprised that it should have been treated so seriously by hon. Members opposite. I do not myself believe that it carries the law the least bit further than it is at the present moment. I know several parishes myself, and I have a very strong impression that there are many more, which, without the assistance of this Bill, have given for Nonconformist burials considerable portions of land attached to the churchyards. If, however, the Bill did not do very much good, what harm could it do? I cannot understand the objection to that kind of permissive legislation, when not the slightest harm can be alleged against it. If asked my opinion of the Bill, there are certain things in it which I do not like. I should not like to see those little bits cut off from the churchyards; but I cannot conceive any reason why people who do like them should not be allowed to have them. I shall give my vote for the Bill, for the simple reason that it is a permissive Bill, which enables persons to do what there is not the slightest harm in doing. It will show a feeling I cannot understand, if hon. Gentlemen vote against a measure which would, at least, alleviate their grievances. I hope that when a measure is brought forward to settle the whole question it will lay down the principle that there should be burial-grounds in England where all persons should have a right to be buried with their own religious services.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN said, he not only disliked little strips of unconsecrated ground attached to their old churchyards and permissive Bills, but also those little nibbling attempts to deal with a great question, which everybody knew must shortly be settled in another manner. But there was another thing he also disliked, and that was a strong Ministry which admitted that there was a grievance and yet would vote for a Bill which they acknowledged did not deal with it, and would not bring in a Bill to deal with it themselves. On both sides of the House there was too great a disposition to look on this matter in a Party light. The right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down devoted the greater part of his speech to attacking a measure which was not before the House; and then, with respect to the Bill they were discussing, said that he did not think it would do any good, but would vote for it because he thought it would not do any harm. To such legislation he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) objected. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Hubbard) claimed liberty for the Church of England; but the Church of England did not require liberty, for she claimed authority, and her demands for liberty were quite of another character from those of denominations which protested against and existed in spite of her authority. The true wisdom of the Church of England was not to exclude Nonconformists, but to open her arms to receive them. With Infidelity on one side, and the Church of Rome on the other, the real policy and the safety of the Church of England was to encourage, and not to check, that feeling which led Nonconformists to wish their dead to be laid in the old churchyards, and to smooth away rather than to perpetuate the points of difference between Nonconformists and Churchmen. He strongly opposed this Bill.

MR. MARTEN said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sandwich (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) objected to permissive Bills; but the Act of 1867 was permissive. The right hon. Gentleman also regretted that a strong Government like Her Majesty's Government did not bring in a comprehensive measure to deal with the question. The answer to that was that Her Majesty's Government had brought forward such a measure, and if it had failed in the House of Lords, the attempt was an honest one, and the failure was through no fault of theirs.

MR. MONK regretted that his hon. Friends around him had unanimously condemned the Bill. It was intended to afford relief in rural parishes; but after this debate, it must be evident that the Bill would not give that satisfaction he had expected. He was entirely in the hands of the House. He would ask leave to withdraw the Bill.

MR. SPEAKER said, there was an Amendment before the House, and the Motion could not be withdrawn unless the Amendment were first withdrawn.

MR. ERNEST NOEL said, he was quite prepared to withdraw the Amendment. ["No, no!"]

THE PLAGUE IN RUSSIA—SANITARY PRECAUTIONS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON, in asking a Question of his noble Friend the Lord President, of which he had given him private Notice, said, that at the commencement of the Session he had, as their Lordships would remember, put a Question to his noble Friend with respect to the plague in Russia, and received a reply stating what precautions had been adopted by the Government on the subject. That morning he had read a startling announcement in the papers, to the effect that the plague was no longer confined to the south-eastern districts of Russia, but, by a sudden bound, had made its way to St. Petersburg, and that 48 persons who were supposed to have been in contact with a person seized by it had been interned. It would be wrong to say anything on the subject which would have a tendency to create any agitation in the public mind; but the matter was one of a very serious character. The plague was of a deadly description, and there was a great difference between its existence in the province of Astrachan and its making its appearance in a capital, which one might say was within a few hours' journey of this country. He was concerned to read in the papers to-day that in a debate which took place upon this question in a learned Society yesterday—the Epidemiological Society—in the course of which a great deal of valuable information was given, and in which certainly nothing was said which could create a panic, a gentleman connected with a Government Department seemed to attach so little importance to the absence or presence of the disease in England that, speaking upon this subject, he went so far as to express a hope that the Government would keep themselves clear of all the nonsense of quarantine. He fully admitted that it was quite competent for a medical gentleman to express any opinion he pleased on such a subject; but he ventured to think that anyone connected with a Government Department was bound to observe great caution, and to use the most guarded language in dealing with such a subject. No doubt, his object was to discountenance anything like a panic; but, at the same time, he was bound to attach due importance to it. He (the Earl of Carnarvon) now repeated what he had said upon a former occasion—that he trusted that Her Majesty's Government would take every precaution that lay in their power. He was sure, from what his noble Friend had said, that he considered it his duty to adopt every possible precaution. In the discussion which took place last night among the medical authorities at the learned Society to which he had referred, it was pointed out that our sanitary code was an excellent one, but that it had not as yet been brought into practical operation. Of course, it was for his noble Friend to consider whether it was possible to do so. If this newspaper report was true, the danger was very close at hand. Upon one point all authorities seemed to be agreed, and that was that distress, poverty, and want of food were conditions that were very favourable to the existence of the plague; and, unfortunately, these conditions existed at the present time to a higher degree than had been experienced for a very long time. He was sure that while his noble Friend would not give any undue importance to any rumours on the subject he would regard the subject as one deserving the attention of the Government; and therefore he hoped he would take every precaution that seemed desirable to prevent the introduction of the plague into this country.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON, in reply, said, that no official confirmation of the report which had appeared in the newspapers of the appearance of the plague at St. Petersburg had been received by Her Majesty's Government—in fact, he had received no information on the subject beyond what his noble Friend possessed. As to the speech to which his noble Friend had more particularly called attention, as having been made by a gentleman connected with a Government Department at a meeting of the Epidemiological Society, he hoped he should not be regarded as wanting in courtesy if he declined to endorse all the opinions of that gentleman—supposing him to have been correctly reported. From the statement of his noble Friend, that gentleman was reported, in the first place, to have said that he would not object to one or two cases of plague occurring here in order that they might be scientifically considered. If he had been correctly reported then, in his (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon's) humble opinion, he had much better not have said it—at any rate, he thought he would not find many persons to agree with him. His next statement was, that he hoped the Government would keep clear of the nonsense of quarantine. To that he could only say that quarantine in certain cases was part of the law of this country; and so long as it remained so, and he continued to fill the office of President of the Privy Council, he would see that the provisions of the law with respect to quarantine were effectually carried out. Scarcely a day passed without the subject of the plague coming before him in some way or other; and he could assure his noble Friend that the Government had been adopting, and would continue to adopt, all due precautions. He was in constant communication with the officers of Customs, and he was of opinion that the powers already possessed by the Privy Council were sufficiently strong.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—DESPATCHES.—QUESTION.

EARL GRANVILLE asked, Whether Her Majesty's Government had received any further information from South Africa?

EARL CADOGAN, in reply, said, that the Government had received no despatches from the seat of war by the Asiatic, the steamer which arrived on Wednesday night; but that she did bring Government despatches from the Cape. It must be remembered that the Asiatic left the Cape only two days after the steamer which brought the first news of the disaster, and had been 27 days on her voyage to this country. Another steamer left on the 4th instant, and the substance of her despatches was forwarded by telegram from Madeira on Saturday last, the vessel itself might be expected to arrive this evening. Another steamer left the Cape on the 11th, and the Government hoped to receive telegrams forwarded by her from Madeira on Saturday next.

FAIRS AND MARKETS (IRELAND).

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON asked the Lord President of the Council, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce, during the present Session, a Bill for the better management of Fairs and Markets in Ireland? The noble Viscount said, that of late years there had been a considerable increase in the practice of holding fairs and markets in small towns in the South and West of Ireland. Those fairs at present created a great deal of inconvenience; and if they were properly regulated, it would involve a certain expense in making proper provision for their management. The result of the want of proper accommodation was, that the fairs and markets were held in the high roads or the main streets of the small towns, and that practice caused great inconvenience to the community in general. Some attempts had been made in both Houses of Parliament to legislate upon the subject, but nothing had been done. He hoped that some attempt would be made this year to deal with this question, which was of more importance than their Lordships might, perhaps, think.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he could corroborate the statement of his noble Friend, that attempts had been made in both Houses of Parliament to deal with this subject. In the year 1854, in the year 1857, in the year 1861, in the year 1862, and in the year 1867, Bills were introduced either into this or the other House of Parliament for the purpose of dealing with that question; and the Bill of 1857, and that of 1861, went before a Select Committee. Moreover, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland appointed a Commission of Inquiry into the subject in 1852, and that Commission made its Report in 1854. The only successful attempt to deal with the subject was by a very small Bill, which became law in 1868, enabling the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to alter the legal times and days for the holding of fairs and markets. The difficulties in legislating on this subject were great, owing to the private interests which were affected by it, and that was, no doubt, the reason why, up to the present time, there had been no legislation upon it. With the amount of Business that Her Majesty's Government had in hand, it was not intended—at all events, at present—to bring in a measure in either House of Parliament for dealing with this subject.

QUESTIONS.

FRENCH LAW OF BANKRUPTCY—THE BANKRUPTCY BILL.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, before further progress is made with the Bankruptcy Bill, the Government will obtain and lay before Parliament a statement of the French Law of Bankruptcy, and the way in which it is administered in that country?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I have consulted the Lord Chancellor upon this subject, and I find that it will be impossible to delay the progress of the Government Bankruptcy Bill in its early stages whilst the information asked for is being obtained; but if the hon. and learned Baronet will move for it, I will do my best to obtain such information as he wants.

ARMY—MILITIA FINES.—QUESTION.

COLONEL NAGHTEN asked the Secretary of State for War, When it is his intention to carry out his promise of last Session that the fines for drunkenness stopped from militiamen should be credited to the stock purse or contingent fund of all militia regiments?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, that the Financial Secretary had had his attention directed to the subject, and before the next training he would issue an Order for appropriating the fines in the manner promised last Session.

TURKEY—LOANS.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If Her Majesty's Government have yet decided whether, by appointing Commissioners to receive certain revenues or otherwise, they propose to do anything to assist the Turkish Government to raise new loans; and, if so, whether anything has been arranged regarding the precedence of Russian and Roumanian claims for war indemnity, so as to avoid future complications on that score?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The question is one upon which Her Majesty's Government and the French Government have been consulting, and it is still under consideration.

CRIMINAL LAW (SCOTLAND)—CASE OF MR. BARR.—QUESTION.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Mr. Barr, a respectable farmer occupying 150 acres in Renfrewshire, who on Wednesday 19th February last was sentenced by Sheriff Cowan at Paisley to fourteen days' imprisonment with hard labour, without option of a fine, for killing a rabbit on land immediately adjoining his own farm; whether he will remit the sentence; and, whether it is proposed in the new Criminal Code to modify the Law so as to prevent the infliction of such sentences?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. WATSON): The circumstances of the case are not quite as they appear in the terms of the Question. Mr. Barr was charged before the Sheriff Substitute with a contravention of the Night Poaching Act, and pleaded "guilty." No option was, therefore, left to the Sheriff Substitute except to pronounce sentence of incarceration, with hard labour. I may state, however, that the Home Secretary, having considered the whole facts of the case, has directed that Mr. Barr should be liberated. I do not know whether it is intended in the new Criminal Code to make any alteration in the punishment for such offences; but I may remind the hon. Member that it is not proposed to extend the provisions of that Code to Scotland.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE DESPATCHES.
QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, with reference to the Despatch from Sir Bartle Frere, dated Dec. 10th (II. p. 182), in which he says—

"I can add little to what has been already said in previous Despatches on the subject of the Military necessity for the reinforcements asked for; but I would venture to add a few remarks on the observations in your Despatch, that 'all the information that has hitherto reached Her Majesty's Government with respect to the position of affairs in Zululand appears to them to justify a confident hope that, by the exercise of prudence, and by meeting the Zulus in a spirit of forbearance and reasonable compromise, it will be possible to avert the very serious evil of a war with Cetywayo.' I am, of course, not aware what information may have reached Her Majesty's Government on this subject other than what has passed through me. But I confess that, looking back at the information I have had the honour to submit to Her Majesty's Government for the past 12 months, I can find little ground for any such hope of avoiding a war with Cetywayo;"

whether he received this Despatch on Jan. 15th; whether he gave any other answer to this Despatch than what is contained in his Despatch of Jan. 23rd—

"It has, of course, been impossible for Her Majesty's Government as yet to examine the whole of the case as it is now placed before them;"

and, whether he will lay upon the Table "the general means of information" which outweighed the "official communications" before the latter had been examined by Her Majesty's Government?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: The despatch from Sir Bartle Frere, dated December 10, was received by me on the date stated in the Papers that have been laid before the House; I think it was the 15th of January. It was answered, with other despatches from Sir Bartle Frere, generally, in my despatch of January 23, and in that whole despatch, not in the particular portion of a sentence quoted by the noble Lord in his Question. I do not quite understand the last portion of the Question; but I gather, from the words which he appears to quote in it, that it has reference to my despatch of October 17. That despatch, of course, refers to the means of information which were in the possession of the Government at that date, and not to despatches since received. So far as I know, everything that can be laid before the House in connection with that subject is already in the hands of hon. Members.

CRIMINAL LAW PUNISHMENT—ADMISSION OF THE PRESS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true, as recently stated in the "Pall Mall Gazette," that he has ordered the exclusion of the representatives of the Press from witnessing the flogging of criminals; and, if so, if he will state to the House what other provision he has made for ensuring to the public the advantage of whatever deterring character there may be in such punishments?

MR. PAGET said, that perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would, at the same time, answer the following Question:—If his attention has been drawn to statements which appeared in the evening papers of the 25th instant, professing to give minute details of the execution of Peace; and, whether it is possible for him to prevent the attendance of reporters at executions, and thus to prevent the publication of details of a revolting character?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: My attention has been called to the statements which appeared in the evening papers of the 25th instant, professing to give minute details of the execution of the unfortunate man Peace; and, having seen those statements, I am at a loss to see what public advantage would be gained by the admission of reporters to witness the flogging of criminals. I take it that the proper course to follow is to see that all such punishments are executed in the presence of certain official and responsible persons not connected with the gaol in order to see that they are properly applied. With this safeguard I think the public may rest content. As to the latter part of the hon. Member for Somersetshire's Question—which has reference to preventing the attendance of reporters at executions—I may say that the Sheriff has by statute the conduct of all those matters in the case of executions, and I have no power to interfere with his discretion.

ARMY—MILITIA TRAINING.

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT EMLYN asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is true that the Militia Regiments in the United Kingdom are to be called out this year for twenty days' training instead of for the usual period of twenty-seven days; if so, what is the reason of this change; and, whether it is intended that the arrangement should be permanent, or merely for this year?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, it is true that the Militia of the United Kingdom are to be called out for 20 days' training this year instead of 27, the usual time, and that it is also intended to curtail the period for Yeomanry training. I can hardly, within the limits of an answer, give details of the reason for the alteration; but I hope an opportunity will soon offer for the statement of my reasons for the curtailment.

ARMY (INDIA)—PAYMENT OF TRAVELLING EXPENSES—THE 3RD HUSSARS.

QUESTION.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he will explain why the Indian Government allowed the claim for travelling expenses in England of the Paymaster of the 3rd Hussars in December 1872, and again in October 1873, and how this fact is in accordance with the invariable rule of the Indian Government to disallow the travelling expenses in England of an officer ordered home from India on sick leave; and, does the order of the Indian Government of November 1878 apply to the Paymaster of the 3rd Hussars, who was directed to proceed to England to appear before a Medical Board by an order of the Indian Government dated 4th April 1878?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The claim for travelling expenses in England of the Paymaster of the 3rd Hussars at the dates named has not been made to, nor paid by, the India Office. The action of the Government of India in November, 1878, had no retrospective effect, but only that of putting an end to the submission of inadmissible claims for the future.

POLICE SUPERANNUATION—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is his intention to introduce a Bill, during the present Session, to give effect to the recommendations of the Select Committee on Police Superannuation, of April 1877?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he should like to take that opportunity of paying his tribute to the Committee for their labours in this matter, and for the admirable Report which they had drawn up. He thought that they had come to a right conclusion that the amalgamation of the Forces for the purpose of a superannuation fund would not meet the justice of the case; and therefore he was inclined to view the latter part of the Report with favour. He could not promise, however, to introduce, at an early period of the Session, a measure on the subject.

CUSTOMS BILL OF ENTRY—THE COMMISSION ON OFFICIAL STATISTICS.—QUESTION.

MR. RYLANDS asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether a Report has been received from the Commission on Official Statistics with reference to the Customs Bill of Entry; and if there will be any objection to lay such Report upon the Table of the House?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, there would be no objection to lay upon the Table that part of the Report relating to the Customs Bill of Entry.

ENGLAND AND PORTUGAL—THE COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. W. CARTWRIGHT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any communication has been received relating to the unsatisfactory state of commercial relations between England and Portugal, such as is referred to in Mr. Morier's Despatch of May 15th 1878, at page 1, of Return No. 21 (Commercial), 1878, on the Portuguese Tariff; and, if so, whether he could present the same in time to admit of its being considered by Members before discussion of a Motion relating to the Wine Duties that stands in my name for 18th March?

MR. BOURKE: It appears that in May last Mr. Morier, Her Majesty's Minister at Lisbon, stated that he would take an early opportunity of calling Lord Salisbury's attention to the unsatisfactory state of the commercial relations of the two countries; but it does not appear that any despatch has yet been received from Mr. Morier such as is referred to in the Question of the hon. Gentleman.

THE PLAGUE IN RUSSIA—SANITARY PRECAUTIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. PULESTON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, as the navigation from the northern ports will be shortly opened, the Government contemplate imposing any restrictions upon the importation of hides and skins and any other animal products from Russia?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The Baltic will not be open before April. The Government have not thought it necessary at present to take any special precautions affecting the trade from Russia; but they have full powers under the Quarantine Act to do whatever may be found expedient for the protection of this country against plague, and will be prepared to exercise those powers should there be any danger of the disease approaching our shores.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—THE DESPATCHES.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When the further Papers relating to the Zulu War, which the Government appear to consider essential to the discussion of the causes of that War, will be in the hands of Members?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I am informed that further Papers will be published the day after to-morrow, or certainly by Monday. I am sorry to say that these Papers will not include despatches entering into details of the military disaster, which I had hoped to receive before this date. They have not yet reached us.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—REMOVAL OF IRISH PAUPERS.—QUESTION.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it is true that the Clerkenwell Board of Guardians have passed a resolution directing the removal to Ireland of "all removable Irish poor?"

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will grant me permission to answer the Question. I have made inquiries of the Guardians of the Holborn Union, in which Clerkenwell is situate, and I find it is true that they have passed a resolution respecting certain paupers—four men and two women—who are to be removed to Ireland. They appear to be the only paupers who are to be removed; and I am told that in each case the paupers have expressed their willingness to go to Ireland, not only to the Board, but before the magistrate before whom the order for removal was signed. It was in consequence of the application of some of these Irish paupers that the Board has taken the resolution in question.

THE TREATY OF BERLIN—RELIGIOUS LIBERTY IN BULGARIA.—QUESTION.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that the proposed Constitution for Bulgaria, while professing to grant "liberty of conscience and worship" to the various denominations not belonging to the Established Russo-Bulgarian Church, adds that such liberty must be always subject to the "Laws" which may be passed from time to time by the Legislative Assembly; and, whether any guarantee has been obtained against the eventual passing of "Laws" in regard to non-established worships calculated to render liberty of conscience more and more purely nominal?

MR. BOURKE: The proposed Constitution of Bulgaria has not yet been received from Her Majesty's Consul in Bulgaria, and we have, therefore, no official knowledge of its provisions. I would remind the hon. Gentleman that Article 5 of the Treaty of Berlin lays down as the basis of the public law of Bulgaria that difference of religion shall not exclude any persons from the enjoyment of civil rights, and that freedom of all forms of worship is assured both to persons belonging to Bulgaria as well as to foreigners.

ARMY — THE 24TH REGIMENT — APPOINTMENT OF OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

MAJOR O'GORMAN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is his intention to re-consider his resolution of sending six officers of the Guards and only three of the Line to act as officers of the 24th Regiment on the embarkation of a draft of that Corps for service at South Africa; and, whether the disproportion between the numbers of the officers of the Line and those of the Guards is not such as to entitle the former to a majority in selection for the above duty? In reference to reports that I have served in the 24th Regiment, I beg leave to say, Sir, first, that I did not serve in the 24th Regiment; second, that I have no relatives in the 24th Regiment; third, that I am not acquainted with any officer of the 24th Regiment, and that I never met the 24th Regiment in quarters or elsewhere.

COLONEL STANLEY: It is unnecessary for the hon. and gallant Gentleman to disclaim being actuated by private motives in putting this Question, the matter to which it relates being of considerable public interest. As regards the Question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, I have to state that there is no intention to re-consider the arrangements made for sending out six officers of the Guards with this large draft of the 24th Regiment. I am not prepared to admit that the question of sending these officers for such duty is altogether a matter of proportion. But if it were so, the fact that there is a large number of officers of the Line serving on special duty with the Forces in South Africa would confirm me in a desire to make no change in the arrangements already made.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

IRELAND—CORK AND MACROOM RAILWAY—ACTION AGAINST DIRECTORS.
QUESTION.

MAJOR O'GORMAN asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether his attention has been attracted to the fact that the defendants in the case of the Cork and Macroom Railway accident, that is to say, the directors of that Railway, did about the 25th November last apply to the Court of Queen's Bench for an order to bring up the Inquisition (which had resulted in a verdict amounting to manslaughter against the defendants) to be quashed; whether a conditional order had on that occasion been granted; whether that order has since been made absolute; and, whether he had taken steps to show cause against this conditional order being made absolute; and, if not, whether it is his intention to interfere so as, in the interest of the public, to prevent the verdict of the jury being quashed?

[No Answer was returned to the Question.]

SUPPLY—SUPPLEMENTARY VOTE OF CREDIT—THE QUEEN'S COLLEGES IN IRELAND.—QUESTION.

MAJOR NOLAN asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether, in the Supplementary Vote of Credit, the item of £33,000 includes any Votes for stationery for the Queen's Colleges in Ireland?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: No, Sir; it does not.

QUESTION.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in view of the disbandment of the Native troops in South Africa, Her Majesty's Government have considered the propriety of employing Coolie or Chinese levies under British officers for the purpose either of Military or Transport Service?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, the subject had been brought to his notice, especially with reference to the selection of Coolies or Chinese for transport service; but although he was making inquiries, he was not yet in possession of sufficient information to justify him in coming to any positive conclusion.

ARMY—SERGEANT INSTRUCTORS OF VOLUNTEERS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL BARNE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Sergeant Instructors of Volunteers appointed Sergeant Majors under Article 204 of Volunteer Regulations, 1863, and previous to the issue of the Volunteer Regulations of 1878, would when they retired be entitled to the pension as laid down for a Sergeant Major in the Royal Warrant dated the 6th of September 1876, and amended the 9th of July 1877?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, he was not prepared to give any positive answer at present to the hon. and gallant Member's Question, and hoped he would repeat it on a future occasion.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—THE REINFORCEMENTS.—QUESTION.

MR. WHITWELL asked the Secretary of State for War, If he would state to the House the names of the Regiments and drafts and the strength of each with the number of horses, and of big and Gatling guns already embarked or under orders immediately to embark for South Africa?

COLONEL STANLEY: I am afraid that I should unduly take up the time of the House if I gave these details. I may say that the total strength of the forces and drafts will be between 8,000 and 9,000 men, 1,800 horses, and about 225 waggons, six 9-pounder, eight 7-pounder guns, and four Gatlings. In a few days hence I shall be able to lay the embarkation Returns, which will give all the details required, on the Table of the House.

SUPPLY—THE SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1878—THE KAFFIR WAR.

QUESTION.

MR. WHITWELL asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the £400,000 named in his answer to a Question on the 9th August last as included in the Supplementary Estimate, and which he stated to be sufficient for the Kaffir War, was found to be sufficient, or whether any additional expenses arising for that War have to be covered by the proposed Supplementary Vote of £1,500,000; and, as the Appropriation Accounts for the Army Expenses have not been circulated, what have been the War Expenses in South Africa during the three years past and the current year up to the 31st March next, inclusive of the proposed Supplementary Vote of £1,500,000?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The statement which I made in August had reference to two distinct matters. They were the expenses incurred in the Kaffir War, or what we may call the "Transkei" War, previous to the 31st of March, 1878, and the expenses incurred and estimated for the remainder of the year—that is, for the year 1878-9. With regard to the expenses incurred previous to the 31st of March, 1878, it was impossible to get them in time for the Statement at the beginning of the financial year. We had, however, reason to believe that they would amount to something like £400,000; and I warned the House that it was probable that an excess Estimate for that amount for the expenditure of the year 1877-8 might have to be provided for. We have, however, since found, on the appropriation of the accounts of the Army, that the saving on other Votes has been sufficient to cover the whole of that amount; and, therefore, no further money will be asked from Parliament in respect of that charge. I should say that we have not been able to include in the appropriation accounts the month of March, 1878; and there may be a balance of something like £60,000 or £70,000 to be carried to the next financial year's accounts. Then, with regard to the Supplementary Estimates I presented to the House in August, amounting to some £300,000 or £400,000 for the Transkei War, they related to the expenditure subsequent to the 31st of March, and I have every reason to believe that that sum is sufficient. No part of it is intended to be charged on the Supplementary Vote of £1,500,000, which has reference only to the Zulu War. With regard to the last part of the Question, I shall have a Statement to make giving the information the hon. Gentleman asks.

Mr. Whitwell

CRIMINAL LAW—THE CONVICT CASTRO OR ORTON.—QUESTION.

DR. KENEALY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true that Charles Peace, the Banner Cross murderer, before his execution, made a statement in which he confessed that he had murdered at Whalley Range, near Manchester, in August 1876, a police constable named Cook; whether subsequently, at the Manchester Assizes, a young man named Habron was tried, convicted, and sentenced to death for the said murder, which sentence was afterwards commuted by the Home Secretary to one of penal servitude for life; whether, taking into consideration that the case was one merely of identity, he will institute an inquiry which may be the means of releasing the said convict, who appeared to be wholly innocent; and, whether, if there be such a case of mistaken identity in fact, he may not be induced to reconsider the conviction of Sir Roger Tichborne, who may also have been wrongly convicted under a similar error?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: It is true that William Habron was tried, convicted, and sentenced to death for the murder of a police constable named Cook, at Whalley Range, near Manchester, in August, 1876. It is also true that his sentence was commuted to penal servitude for life, on the ground that there was some reasonable doubt as to whether his was the hand that fired the shot which killed the police constable, but not as to whether he was implicated in the murder in other ways. It is true that the convict Charles Peace made a statement after his conviction, and while under sentence of death, that he was the man who shot police constable Cook. The House, I am quite sure, will feel, on the one hand, that this is a matter which will require most careful consideration; and, on the other, hand, that the statement so made is one which must undergo the most careful scrutiny. But whatever the result of the inquiry into the matter may be, it can in no way affect the case of the prisoner Thomas Castro, otherwise Arthur Orton, now undergoing a sentence of penal servitude for a totally different offence.

PARLIAMENT—PRIVILEGE—THE PRESS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: I am sorry, Sir, to interpose for a short time between the House and the special Business which is set down for this evening, but I have no alternative. I have to call your attention to a serious breach of Privilege, which is contained in a leading article which appeared in The Times newspaper of Tuesday last, reflecting on the conduct and misrepresenting the action of Members of this House. I have provided myself with a copy of the newspaper in question, and I have marked the portion of it to which I have to take exception, and if it is your wish, Sir, I will hand it in to be read from the Table, or I will now state as shortly as I can the substance of it, and it can then be read. In bringing this matter forward, I feel that it is only under the gravest circumstances that I should be justified in doing so. Having carefully considered the article in question, and the position of Members of this House, I can come to no other conclusion than that it is a deliberate attempt to intimidate hon. Members in the discharge of their duty, and also a reckless misstatement of facts occurring in this House. The law of Parliament on this subject I hold to be perfectly clear. It is a distinct breach of the Privileges of this House, and destructive of the freedom of Parliament, for anyone to publish the names of hon. Members of the House, and to reflect on and misrepresent their proceedings. Now, The Times newspaper of Tuesday published an article referring to the proceedings of the House as to the alteration of its Rules, and I am prepared to read a short epitome of it. I may here state that I am named individually, and that, therefore, I should have a right, as a Member of Parliament, to bring this matter under the notice of the House; but I believe I am also supported by a very considerable number—I may say by all—of the Members who are around me, and who are also referred to in the article. Sir, The Times says in that article that the Home Rulers watched the debates in Parliament on this subject—that is to say, as to our Rules—"with a malign intent," and at a given moment, as soon as the opposition of the independent Members appeared to have exhausted itself, and a compromise was coming into view, the Obstructionists "emerged from their ambush" for the purpose of putting into operation "their policy of exasperation." The article goes on to say—

"The proceedings in the House last night reveal a resolution to obstruct progress as clear as that which has been conspicuous in former debates."

And referring to myself and another Member by name, the article points out that the Home Rulers voted in minorities of 49 and 31; and adds that we, whom it calls "Obstructionists," seemed almost to have succeeded in postponing a division on the first of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Resolutions till another night. Another inference is further added that—

"The irritation of the priesthood against the Government, and the approach of a General Election, combine to give the Obstructionist view a temporary predominance."

Now, Sir, I am in a position to prove, from the Division Lists, that a more unfounded statement was never made. In all the Divisions, except one, that took place, there were more English than Irish Members; but it seems to me that whatever may be the opinion of the writer of this article, it is a very serious matter for any person to allow himself to accuse hon. Members of this House of lying in wait with "malign intent," to commit a breach of the Privileges of the House. Obstruction is a distinct Parliamentary offence, punishable by the Rules of the House; and to attribute deliberate obstruction to Members of this House is to attribute to them a serious offence against the House itself, of which the House ought to take cognizance. If these charges of obstruction are to be made without foundation, I submit that there is an insult to the majesty of Parliament itself. To show that the House of Commons is obliged to submit to obstruction of this character, and that it is not able to vindicate its authority, is, I submit, not for the benefit of this House. But the Division Lists will show how far this charge was well founded, or the reverse. The debates commenced on Monday, the 17th of February. In the first Division the minority consisted of 77 Members, 50 of whom were English and 27 were Irish. In the second Division the minority consisted of 71 Members, 45 of whom were English and 26 Irish. In the Divisions on Thursday the minority in the first was composed of 68 Members, 42 of whom were English and 26 Irish. In the second Division the minority consisted of 57 Members, of whom 37 were English and 20 Irish. In the third Division the Question of Adjournment was moved by an English Member, and seconded by another English Member. The Mover was the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), and the Seconder the hon. Member for East Gloucestershire (Mr. J. R. Yorke), who sits on the other side of the House. The minority consisted of 45 Members, of whom 25 were English and 20 Irish. On the 24th of February the minority in the first Division consisted of 81 Members, of whom 62 were English and 19 were Irish; and I may mention, to show the difference of opinion which existed as to the proposed alteration of these Rules, that in the minority was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, while the Leader of the Opposition voted on the opposite side. In the second Division, which was one taken on a Motion of my own to divide the Estimates, and specially alluded to in the article, the minority consisted of 51, of whom 29 were English and 22 were Irish. To show whether there is any foundation for the libellous article of The Times, I may mention that in the minority was the hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope), and I think he will be surprised to hear himself called an Obstructionist. I always thought the Gentleman the University of Cambridge honoured by making its Representative did honour to the University in return. On the third night there was one Division in which the number of Irish Members was larger than the number of English Members. In the Division, which related specially to Ireland, the minority consisted of 33; but there were 10 English Members who voted in it. In another Division on that night the minority consisted of 49, of whom 24 were English and 25 Irish; but amongst the English Members were the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke), and the hon. Member for the City of Bristol (Mr. Morley), and an hon. and gallant Colonel (Colonel Mure), so that I think there must have been some reason in the Division. In the fifth Division the minority consisted of 52 Members—30 English and 22 Irish; and the last consisted of 52 Members, who were also made up of 30 English and 22 Irish, and amongst them were the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge, who has been so consistent throughout the discussion of this question, and other hon. Members on the Government side of the House. I think, therefore, it is proved beyond the shadow of doubt or cavil that the charge of wilful obstruction in the House against the Home Rulers is a totally unfounded and improper charge. The House, I suggest, is now sitting in a judicial capacity, and I think it ought to lay aside for a moment—if it will allow me to say so—all Party considerations and to consider whether the freedom of hon. Members of all classes should not be vindicated when it is assailed in this way. If these statements appeared in an uninfluential journal, I would not have occupied the time of the House by calling attention to them; but The Times is regarded at home as the leading journal of this country, while on the Continent it is considered to be the leading journal of Europe. Numbers of persons take their opinions from The Times, and believe nothing except what they read in its leading articles. The Times, as it came out in the Parliamentary Committee on Reporting, has exceptional advantages in the Reporters' Gallery. It has specially assigned to it a place for a summary writer, or leader writer; and, therefore, it may very well be that this very article, which totally misrepresented the facts, was written by one who at the very time, from the place in which he has a right to sit, had an opportunity of ascertaining the real facts of the case. I think Gentlemen who are proprietors of newspapers in this House occupy a peculiar position. The hon. Member who is known to be the proprietor of The Times is a gentleman whom everyone respects, and, of course, he has an opportunity of combatting the opinions of hon. Members from his place in this House. But it is a very serious matter beyond that, when in his paper the conduct and demeanour of Members of this House are misrepresented in a journal under the control of the hon. Member who is to go without responsibility. After this article in The Times has been read from the Table I shall move that it is a distinct breach of the Privileges of this House, and if the House be of that opinion, I shall make a further Motion respecting the proprietor and publisher of the paper. [Laughter.] Hon. Members may laugh; but I beg to say this is a matter of great seriousness. The only thing that could be accomplished by it, and the only object of that article, is to bring odium on the Members of this House, and to excite ill-feeling between the two countries of England and Ireland. For my part, I do not think that ill-feeling ought to be more stimulated at the present moment; and if this House is not ready to protect hon. Members in the discharge of their duties, I can only say that we shall very much fail in our duty if we allow ourselves to be intimidated by such articles as this. In conclusion, I beg to say these charges of Obstruction appear to me to be becoming to be made a little too often, and, in fact, the House is losing its dignity. [Ironical cheers.] I expected these cheers, and I was prepared for them. There is nothing new in this charge of Obstruction. When the Government at present in Office was not in Office, the noble Lord the Member for Haddington (Lord Elcho), in a debate on the Business of the House, expressed himself to the effect that the House ought to be cautious in allowing the two front Benches to arrange the Business. The noble Lord went on to remark—

“The burden of the speeches of Ministerial Members during the Recess has been that the conduct of the Opposition last Session brought Public Business to a standstill, and that the Forms of the House must be altered, so as to take away from the minority powers which had been improperly exercised.”

That charge, made against Gentlemen who are not usually called Obstructionists, is the very charge now brought against those Irish Members who maintain their right to debate fully every question. The shrinking from a fair stand-up fight on a particular question is a characteristic of an effete Parliament. If we are to have our debates of a namby-pamby order, we had better go to the country at once. I am not willing—I have no right —to put any Question to the Chair; but I will appeal to experienced Members of the House, whether there has or has not been on any one of these occasions anything that could fairly be called Obstruction? I have shown that if there was Obstruction, it existed on the part of English Members more than on the part of Irish Members; but I repudiate this wretched charge of Obstruction. We have duties to discharge in this House. We must discharge them manfully, and, if necessary, with pertinacity. Some years ago another newspaper charged hon. Members in this House with venality, and an hon. Member, who is now no more, brought the matter before Parliament. The Irish Members at that time were called “Ultramontanes.” They were previously to that called “the Pope’s Brass Band,” and they are now called “Obstructionists.” There is always some opprobrious name to be attached to the Irish Members. On that occasion The Pall Mall Gazette—a journal which says it is written for gentlemen by gentlemen—the next day apologized for the statement, which drew from both sides very strong condemnation. In its apology, it said that the gentleman usually employed to write the article was away, and the leader had been entrusted to a fresh hand. May I not hope that perhaps the leading journal on this occasion found not its proper leader writer, but an apprentice hand, and one who, in making this accusation, has not brought credit on that journal, but very considerable odium on himself, and injury to the dignity of the House? I beg to move that this article be read.

[Complaint made to the House by Mr. Mitchell Henry, Member for Galway County, of an article in the “Times” newspaper of the 25th day of this instant February.]

MR. SPEAKER: Let the hon. Member bring it up.

The said paper was delivered in and the article complained of read.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: I move that—

“The said article contains libellous reflections upon certain Members of this House in breach of the Privileges of this House.”

MR. DEASE seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the said article contains libellous reflections upon certain Members of this House in breach of the Privileges of this House."—(Mr. Mitchell Henry.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the relations between the House of Commons and the Press are always, I think, delicate, and we must be careful of the way in which we take notice of comments which are made upon our proceedings in the journals of the day. Undoubtedly we do see, from time to time, articles in papers of the highest character which appear to us, or some of us, to give an inaccurate, and sometimes, as we think, an unfair, account of what takes place within the walls of this House. Sometimes, no doubt, remarks and comments are made upon the speeches and actions of hon. Members which are of a nature to cause dissatisfaction, and sometimes to induce us to take notice of them, either by correction addressed to the paper itself, or if thought worthy of the attention of the House by calling that attention. But I think there is a general feeling among us that in all these matters we ought to be very tender, and not to interfere with the fair liberty of the Press. We do not require to insist upon privileges of, perhaps, a rather obsolete character, which would enable us entirely to forbid or prevent any remarks upon what has taken place in this House. We do not desire in any way to object to fair comments, although those comments may sometimes appear to be mistaken and unfair. But I do think that it is quite right and proper that Members who may feel themselves specially aggrieved by anything that has been said should call attention to it, and should ask the protection of the House against such misrepresentation. Now, Sir, we have heard read the article of which the hon. Gentleman complains. Undoubtedly, in listening to that article, one cannot help feeling that it contained some severe remarks upon the conduct of Members of this House, and that the writer of the article used one expression which was worthy of special notice. I refer to the words that the Irish Members "had watched the debate with a malign intent." Now, if there is one Rule that is more strictly observed than another amongst Members of this House, it is that we object to one Member imputing motives and intentions to other Members, and that which we object to amongst ourselves we regard with some jealousy when it is applied by others. Well, what was "the malign intent" with which the Irish Members were charged? It was the malign intent of obstructing Public Business. Now, the question arises whether hon. Members opposite consider that to be a serious offence? I have heard language upon former occasions which induced me to think that they would have hardly looked upon that as so serious an offence as I am glad to see that the hon. Member and his Friends consider it. I must say I think it is a matter for special congratulation that the hon. Member, occupying, as he does, so prominent a position amongst the ranks of the Irish Members, should have distinctly put it as one of the grounds of complaint that the article in question accuses him and hon. Members near him of being guilty of that which is a distinct Parliamentary offence. [Cheers.] He is perfectly right in stating, in my opinion, that wilful and deliberate obstruction of the Business of the House is a distinct Parliamentary offence; and we gladly welcome from him and from hon. Members sitting near him, as I gather from their cheers, that there is no intention to minimize or palliate that offence. In these circumstances, the question as to what was intended in the three nights to which reference has been made is one which we must consider in the light of the facts which the hon. Gentleman has brought before us. Unquestionably, if the opposition offered to the Resolutions on the Business of the House was of an obstructive character, the hon. Member has proved his case that the charge of obstruction cannot be altogether confined to any particular section of the House, or to the Irish Members. A considerable number of Members of the House felt that the proposals contained in these Resolutions were important, and that they raised questions which in their view were deserving of very long and serious consideration; and of opposition which might be carried to a very considerable length. Among those were Members who clearly cannot be accused of having the slightest sympathy with obstruction. My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope), for instance, is a man whom nobody would think of accusing, under any circumstances, of obstruction, and yet that hon. Gentleman was quite as vigorous as anybody else during the debate. I am glad that the matter has been brought forward in the way it has been by the hon. Member—good-humouredly and temperately. The hon. Gentleman acknowledged that if a charge of obstruction could be maintained it would be a serious one; because obstruction is a distinctly Parliamentary offence, and he disclaimed for himself and those who sit near him any such intention. I hope, in the circumstances, we shall not be called upon to go further than what has now passed. We may place ourselves in a position of some embarrassment if we are called upon to vote on the Question that he has moved. Supposing the House were to decide that these words did amount to a breach of Privilege, we should have to follow that up by calling the proprietor and printer of The Times to the Bar; and I do not think it would be either for the interest of the House or of the public that we should engage in a conflict of that kind. On the whole, therefore, I venture to think that, having called attention to the subject in the manner he has done, the hon. Member would do well to withdraw his Motion.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE: Having been mentioned in the article, by the hon. Gentleman opposite, and by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I hope the House may allow me to say a few words on the question. I thank my right hon. Friend for vindicating me so thoroughly from the charge of obstruction. So far from obstructing, I was obstructed by the Forms of the House, because it happened that on the greater part of the second night's debate I was prevented from speaking at all. On the first night I proposed an Amendment which did not quite satisfy me; on the second, therefore, I asked leave to withdraw it, in order that it might be cast in a better form—such leave was a matter of course, and would have been the work of only a few seconds; but my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) took the occasion to deliver one of those noble orations after the manner of the ancients to which we always listen with such delight. The general debate thus raised in so irregular a way, on a question in which the House was very much interested, occupied the greater part of the night, and I was the only Member that was precluded from speaking on it. I cannot accept the history which is given in this article of what took place during the three nights as accurate; but though it may be inaccurate, I cannot say that it is libellous. Members of Parliament must, above all things, show that they are not thin-skinned. Parliament is the great institution of the country, but the Press is a great institution, too. If there is anything in the Press which it is our duty, in the interest of public morality, to protest against, let us do it—but do not, I repeat, let us be thin-skinned on merely personal matters. The Resolution now before the House would, in my opinion, inflict a blow on the liberty of the Press, though the hon. Member cannot intend to do such a thing. To censure The Times for an article which, at the worst, is a little inaccurate and one-sided, would, in my judgment, not be a wise thing to do.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I am extremely anxious, if possible, to avoid entering into a debate on what was the meaning of The Times' article, and, therefore, I make no apology for rising thus early in the discussion. I would appeal to my hon. Friend to consider the advice given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I presume the object of my hon. Friend was to have an opportunity of repudiating the accusation of obstruction put upon the conduct of himself and his Friends rather than to bring the publisher of The Times to the Bar of this House for punishment. I think my hon. Friend has entirely gained his object. The Leader of the House has stated, with very general assent, that the account which has been given in The Times was inaccurate, and that an unfair construction has been put upon the conduct of the Home Rule Members. I think my hon. Friend will do well to be satisfied with that statement, and will not press the matter further. The House will remember that two Sessions ago I endeavoured to induce the House to re-consider the Rules which regulate its relations with the Press. The House, I am sorry to say, was not willing to entertain those proposals, and the Standing Orders and Rules which regulate these relations still remain, in my opinion, of a most unsatisfactory and obsolete character. Such as they are, it is absolutely necessary that we should avoid placing ourselves in a very unworthy and discreditable position. We must exercise the great Privileges we possess with great caution and forbearance. Therefore, I think it would be undesirable, in such a case as this, to carry the matter further. I do not wish to say a word in palliation of the article in The Times; I do not wish to invite the House to enter upon that subject; but I would point out, for the satisfaction of my hon. Friend, that the obstruction imputed to him is not that wilful obstruction which I understand has been declared by the highest authority as an offence against the Privileges and dignity of the House, but that kind of obstruction which, from time to time, is practised in all parts of the House, and about which there is great difference of opinion. We shall never agree whether speeches are too long or not, or whether an undue number of speeches are made. I do not think, so far as the article in The Times is concerned, there was any intention of imputing "wilful" obstruction. However, we should waste our time in attempting to settle that point. I think my hon. Friend will be satisfied with the expression of opinion which he has obtained from the Leader of the House.

MR. SHAW: I venture, also, to express a hope that my hon. Friend will not press his Motion to a division. I read the article, and think it went considerably further than the Chancellor of the Exchequer would seem to imply. It appeared to me to grossly misrepresent the action of certain Members of the House who were in a minority. When my hon. Friend expressed his intention of bringing forward his Motion I was completely staggered; and I said to him that as there was exactly the same kind of descriptions of our conduct to be seen in the English papers week after week, that it would be useless to take the trouble of puffing into notoriety an article which would pass out of mind the day after its appearance. If we are to fight a battle we must not be thin-skinned. I am not a bit afraid myself if the whole House and the whole Press of the country called me an Obstructionist. Where I honestly oppose a Bill I shall oppose it, no matter what the papers say about me. We must not do anything that would in any way prevent comment in the Press upon the conduct of Members of this House. I believe the liberty of the Press was of still more importance than some of the privileges we enjoy in this House. For my own part, the only newspaper I am afraid of is The Skibbereen Eagle, which made a greater man than me—the late Lord Chancellor—tremble in his shoes. The article complained of went beyond the customary rule of comment and imputed improper motives; but the hon. Member having elicited a strong expression of opinion from both sides of the House as to its impropriety might, I consider, fairly withdraw his Motion.

MR. PARNELL presumed his hon. Friend the Member for Galway had fulfilled the object he had in view, and therefore it would not be necessary for him to go to a Division. He rose merely to point out that there was something more serious than many people thought in the practice of The Times and other newspapers in misrepresenting the conduct of the Irish Members. Their desire was, above all things, to cultivate the good opinion of England with reference to Irish questions, and such articles in The Times would mislead public opinion with regard to them. The outside public would, therefore, be entirely misinformed as to the motives and action of Irish Members, and a feeling would be got up against them so as to prevent Irish Members doing their duty in the House. A proposition was made before the Select Committee last year that when any Member was accused of obstruction a Division might be taken without debate, and a decision come to summarily on the conduct of the Member in question and the punishment to be inflicted on him. If such a Rule were enforced—and it might be by the Chancellor of the Exchequer during the present Session—the opinion of the Members of the House might be so perverted by the publication of such articles that many who had not heard the speech of the Irish Member whose conduct was impugned might come in and vote for his suspension and the suspension of the rights of his constituency, not on the ground of their actual observation of his conduct, but by reason of the injurious impression derived from reading such articles. He submitted, in these circumstances, such articles assumed a much more serious complexion. The article in question imputed a deliberate intention to commit a Parliamentary offence, and, in a most invidious way, drew a line between English and Irish Members. But having performed a public duty in calling attention to the article, and having elicited an expression of opinion from all sides of the House as to its unwarrantable character, he hoped his hon. Friend would withdraw his Motion.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: My object in bringing this matter before the House was, not because I want to make a stand against the newspapers of the country, or to unduly curtail their liberty of fair comment and criticism. I believe I have most conclusively shown that there is not the slightest foundation for the mis-statements which appear in the article to which I have drawn the attention of the House. At the same time, I do not think the Chancellor of the Exchequer made a fair and generous acknowledgment of the erroneous character of the article as I should have expected; but the noble Lord has done so. Other Members may have their own opinions about it; but in withdrawing my Motion, in deference to the expressed wishes of the House on both sides, I hope the House will remember that if ever an accusation of this serious character be again made, it may turn out on examination to be as equally unfounded as the present.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MOTION.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved—

“That the Orders of the Day subsequent to Supply be postponed until after the Order of Leave for a Bill relating to the Discipline and Regulation of the Army.”

MR. DILLWYN asked whether it was intended to take the Supplementary Estimates other than the Vote of Credit for the South African War to-night?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he should be very inconsistent with himself if he were to try and press forward the Supplementary Estimates without giving proper time for their examination. The Secretary to the Treasury was perfectly prepared to go on with them; but he quite saw the reasonableness of the objection made by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Dillwyn), and he should, therefore, confine himself to proposing a Vote in connection with the Exchequer Bonds, which expired on the 16th of March, and a Vote of Credit in connection with South Africa.

Motion agreed to.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—THE VOTE OF CREDIT.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think, Sir, it would be for the convenience of the House that before you leave the Chair I should say a few words upon the two Votes which will be submitted in Committee. There is the Vote to renew the £2,750,000 of Exchequer Bonds, which fall in in the last weeks of March, and there is the Vote of Credit for the South African Services. With regard to the Bonds I need say but little. They belong to the finance of the year 1877-8. They were issued in that year to meet certain expenditure which had been voted, and it was hoped at one time that, in part at least, they would be discharged in the course of the present year. Circumstances, however, have been against us, and we have not been able to pay them off this year; and, therefore, it is necessary that we should take power to re-issue, or rather to issue, new Bonds in order to enable us to pay off these as they become due. With respect to the Vote of Credit, it is, of course, a new feature. As I explained just now, in answer to a Question of the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Whitwell), I last year warned the House that there might be a sum of, perhaps, £400,000 required for hostilities in South Africa. That did not refer at all to the Zulu War. It is well the House should bear in mind that the hostilities in South Africa are distinctly divisible into two periods—the period of what we may call the Transkei War, and the period of this unhappy conflict. The Transkei War was begun in August, 1877, and ended about July, 1878, and it was with reference to that that our Votes and my observations were made. No accounts were made up in time for the last Budget as to the expenditure up to March 31, 1878, as regards the Transkei War. We knew, by the drafts on the Treasury Chest, that there had been great expenditure; and I therefore warned the House that it was probable, before the expiration of this financial year, I should be obliged to present an excess Estimate. But that has not been found necessary, because the Army Votes were sufficient for the Services for which they were intended, and there were enough savings upon them to cover the amount. Well, then, there were further Supplementary Estimates taken of £300,000 for the Army, and about £40,000 for the Navy in August last. That was for the same war; and, as far as we at present know, that sum will be sufficient for the expenses incurred. With regard to the Zulu War, the expenditure properly chargeable to that contest may be said to have commenced in October last, when the first preparations appear to have been made. It is rather difficult to give full information as to what has been the actual expenditure occasioned by that war; but my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for War and the First Lord of the Admiralty will be able to tell the House when it gets into Committee on what grounds the Estimates have been framed, so far as they have been able to frame them. I may only add that, being myself aware that the Treasury chest has been heavily drawn upon, I have thought it right to put into the Vote a sum of £300,000 for contingencies over and above the more detailed Estimates to be presented by my right hon. Friends. The House will bear in mind that that expenditure in respect to a distant war is carried on through the Treasury chest, and that the way in which that is done is this—the Treasury chest has a fixed Fund of, I think, about £1,000,000, which ought always to be maintained, and out of that Fund either payments are directly made, or bills are drawn, and the fund is used to meet these drafts, and from time to time it is replenished out of the Votes for the Army Fund. The Military chest has been heavily drawn upon for South Africa, and we therefore are now obliged to replace that Fund again. With regard to the Vote of Credit, the amount we propose to take is £1,500,000, and the details relating to it will be found in the Papers submitted to the House. I shall be asked—and I may as well enter on the question briefly now—in what way I propose we should raise this £1,500,000? I desire to point out to the House that we are now at a period so nearly approaching the close of the financial year and the next Budget, that it is hardly convenient for us to enter upon new financial operations at this moment; and, therefore, I shall propose a temporary arrangement to carry us over the end of this year and the beginning of next. I hope it will be in my power to bring in the Budget very early in April, before Easter; and, in the meantime, I propose that this money, if voted, shall be raised by the issue of Exchequer Bonds. In mentioning Exchequer Bonds, I wish to say two or three words in regard to what appears to me to be rather a mistaken idea in many quarters as to the nature and amount of our floating Debt. I observe that in many influential organs of public opinion there is an impression that the floating Debt has of late years been increased to a very large and even dangerous extent. I think that in some respects the idea arises from a confusion between the terms floating Debt and unfunded Debt, and that there is evidently a disposition to think that all unfunded Debt is floating Debt, which is not the case. The objections to a large floating Debt are, of course, these—that the securities which properly constitute a floating Debt may be presented for redemption suddenly or at inconvenient times, and in such a manner as to somewhat embarrass the Exchequer, or that, in renewing them, it might be necessary to give a high rate of interest. Now, that is the case undoubtedly with what is properly called a floating Debt—that is to say, Exchequer Bills and Treasury Bills. There can be no doubt that those bills are liable to be so presented, and that if they were in excess they might occasion some embarrassment. On the other hand, it is not quite to the same extent the case with Exchequer Bonds, which run for certain periods—two, three, or four years—even if these bonds are in the hands of the public; but still less is it the case with regard to a great deal of the unfunded Debt which now exists, because that is not in the hands of the public at all. It is money advanced by the National Debt Commissioners, and which, in fact, is only advanced from one hand of the State to the other, and is not, and cannot be, liable to the objection to which Exchequer and Treasury Bills are supposed to be liable. Let us see how we stand. The present amount of unfunded Debt is about £24,661,000; that consists of £14,458,000 of Exchequer Bonds, £4,497,000 of Exchequer Bills, and £5,706,000 of Treasury Bills. But of the £14,458,000 of Bonds now in existence no less than £11,708,000 are in the hands of the hands of the National Debt Commissioners, so that even if we reckoned as part of the floating Debt the Exchequer Bonds in the hands of the Bank of England the unfunded Debt is really no more than £12,953,000. That is a sum which, though I do not say it is altogether insignificant, is by no means open to the charge of being extravagantly large. I have seen it stated that we ought to take steps, by funding or otherwise, to bring the floating Debt down to within £15,000,000. There can be no doubt that a certain amount of floating Debt is a convenience to the public, and also an advantage to the Exchequer; because the public, as hon. Gentlemen connected with business are aware, are glad to get a certain amount of Treasury and Exchequer Bills, and they take them at a lower rate of interest than they would have to pay if the same money was raised by the issue of Consols. I therefore think that the alarm which has been expressed with regard to the supposed magnitude of the floating Debt of the country is somewhat exaggerated. Having said these few words respecting it, there is one other question that may probably be asked of me. I may be asked what effect these Votes will have upon our financial position? I have said that at this time of the year, and with the Budget so near at hand, I must speak with reserve, and I hope I shall not be called upon to go into minute and conjectural details. There are always difficulties in estimating the Revenue towards the close of the year, and these difficulties are likely to be as great this year as upon any other occasion. But, speaking generally, I think I may say that the Revenue may probably fall short of the estimated Expenditure by something under £1,000,000; and I am sorry to say that the Expenditure, including the Vote of Credit and the Supplementary Estimates, and without reference to the £2,700,000 of Bonds, will exceed what we may now expect to be the Revenue by something like £3,000,000. At the same time, it must be borne in mind that £2,000,000 of that amount has been already provided for. In August we obtained permission to issue £2,000,000 of Exchequer Bonds, and these will absorb £2,000,000 out of the £3,000,000. I cannot say the outturn will be as I have described. I have put the figures in what I think to be the most unfavourable light, and I think I am making a safe statement when I put the probable excess of Expenditure over Revenue at £1,000,000. Under these circumstances, it might be sufficient for me to ask for £1,000,000 of Exchequer Bonds; but I desire to be on the safe side, and to guard against any contingencies that may arise from disappointment in the Revenue. It will, therefore, be my duty at a later time—in Committee of Ways and Means—to propose an issue of £1,500,000 of Exchequer Bonds to carry us through to the end of this year. Of course, if my anticipations are fulfilled, and we do not want this money, the power will not be exercised to the extent I have indicated. I may mention, with regard to the Vote of Credit, that it is proposed to take it for the remainder of the present financial year. The power will lapse on the 1st of April, and anything further which may be necessary will be found the subject of a Supplemental Estimate. With these remarks, I beg to move that you, Sir, do now leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. CHILDERS: I do not remember any instance of a Financial Statement of the importance of that which we have just listened to being made before the Whole House, such Statements having always heretofore being made in Committee of Ways and Means. But, Sir, I shall not press that objection; but there is one remark which I feel it absolutely right I should make to the House upon the Statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He has told us that he is taking the present course because we are approaching the end of the year, and he followed that with the remark that after the end of the financial year it would be his duty to place the Budget before the House. I wish to say to the House—and I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be able to make a clear answer to my allegation—that according to all precedent, when our finance is in its present serious position, the Budget ought not to be postponed to the month of April. In every previous case when the finances have been in this position, the Government has come down to the House with the Budget either in February, or, at least, never later than the beginning of March; and considering the great effect which is produced on trade by the expectancy in which the country is kept when a Budget of such importance as this year's is delayed—to say nothing of other considerations my reticence as to which my right hon. Friend will appreciate—the Government ought not to delay it, not a mere week or two weeks, but, as it will turn out, for two months, from the commencement of the Session. The Budget ought to have been brought in within a week or two of the meeting of the House, as has been done under similar circumstances in previous years. My right hon. Friend, some years ago, published a valuable work, from which I have taken some facts which I will quote to the House. From that work it appears that Sir Robert Peel had a very serious deficit in 1842, and the Budget was produced on March 11. In 1845 great changes were necessary, and the Budget was produced on February 17. In 1847 it was necessary to raise a very large loan, amounting to something like £8,000,000, and the Budget was produced on February 27. In 1848 there was a very serious deficit, and the Budget was produced on February 18. In 1854 there were important financial operations rendered necessary by the possibility of war with Russia, and the Budget was produced on March 6. In 1860 there was a still more serious state of things, and the Budget was produced on February 10. The only very recent case of serious deficit was in 1867, at the time of the Abyssinian War, and the addition to taxation was made in the month of November. Those are all the cases since the time of Sir Robert Peel when there has been a deficit of serious magnitude, and in every case the Budget has been produced, not at the beginning of the financial year, but some time before the end of the previous financial year. I think I have shown to the House that the Chancellor of the Exchequer must explain why on the present occasion, when our financial position is so serious, the Budget is not brought in at once without waiting till the first week in April. And now let me sum up in a few sentences our present financial position. We concluded the year 1877-8 with a deficit of £2,750,000. We were told in the original Budget of 1878-9 that the new taxes would yield enough to give a surplus of from £710,000 to £1,210,000 to go in reduction of that debt, and that next year it would be entirely wiped out. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was allowed to amend his Budget in August. Instead of a surplus in 1878-9, he then estimated for a serious deficiency of £1,577,000, which, added to the deficit of the previous year, would compel us to begin 1879-80 with a deficit of £4,307,000, and he proposed no Ways and Means to meet it. We protested, but in vain. What is the case now? Last year we were charged with audacity in thinking that the Revenue Estimates were sanguine; but now we are told that they will fall short by something under £1,000,000. We are told that there is to be a deficit this year, exclusive of 1877-8, of at least £3,000,000, and that we shall not be safe unless we meet this to the extent of £3,500,000 by the issue of the Exchequer Bonds which the right hon. Gentleman now proposes; so that the years 1877-8 and 1878-9 are to close with an accumulated deficit of from £5,750,000 to £6,250,000. Has the House thoroughly appreciated the fact? I am not exaggerating, or giving a single figure which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not given himself. Here we are at the commencement of a Zulu war, with a falling Revenue, with almost a certainty that the financial position of next year is going to be serious even in comparison with this, with an accumulated deficit of £6,000,000, and yet we are going to delay the Budget till April. Sir, there has not been a more serious deficit since the first Reform Bill. Therefore, I say it is the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer not to postpone introducing the Budget. I will not suggest, or even hint, at the measures that must be taken by the Government; but I would urge that the Budget should be at once brought forward, in order that the commercial public may see what the effect of the Government finance will be. With regard to the other question of the unfunded Debt, it is a very inconvenient time to discuss it now. There are many points which, I allow, it might be very desirable to raise, but which cannot be well raised or discussed with you, Sir, in the Chair, and when, after asking a Question, it is out of our power to rise again. I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer has done good by showing the difference which exists between what is popularly called the floating Debt and the unfunded Debt; but when he speaks of the unfunded Debt as being of no importance, and would appear to regard the transactions of the last year or two in that respect with perfect satisfaction, let me remind him of this one fact—that while he has been adding very largely indeed to the unfunded Debt in the hands of the public during the last few years, the Government brokers have been at work all the time, and, partly by their operations, and partly in another shape, the unfunded Debt—exclusive of the Terminable Annuities—has been very considerably decreased in each year. Whether it is wise to increase the unfunded Debt in years of emergency is a matter of opinion; but nothing can be more undesirable than, at the same time, to increase your unfunded Debt, and to reduce your funded Debt. I hope, when the proper opportunity comes round, the House will discuss these matters and the effect in this respect of the finance of the last few years. For the present, I will content myself with pointing out that we are about to start a fresh year with the most serious deficit that I remember, and yet we are to have no Budget for five or six weeks. That is, I venture to say, a state of things with which the House ought not to be satisfied.

ARMY — THE ARTILLERY — BREECH-LOADING AND MUZZLE-LOADING GUNS.—RESOLUTION.

MAJOR NOLAN, in rising to move—

“That the great difference which exists between our cannon and those which find favour with Foreign Powers calls for careful investigation, and that it would be unwise to further postpone experiments on such classes of breech-loading guns as are now possessed by other Powers;”

said, the question, although perhaps not so interesting to the House as the discussion on financial matters which had just taken place, was, nevertheless, one of considerable importance to the country; and he had more than once drawn attention to the difference in the construction of the cannon of this country and that of other Continental Powers. It was generally allowed in the Press that England stood alone in the class of cannon which she had, England holding to the muzzle-loader, while on the Continent the breech-loader was favoured. He made a statement to that effect last year, and he was corrected by the noble Lord opposite the Surveyor General of Ordnance (Lord Eustace Cecil) who said that his statement as to the general adoption of breech-loading ordnance by the Continental Powers was only partly accurate. The noble Lord admitted that the four great military and naval Powers—Russia, Germany, France, and Austria, were exclusively in favour of breech-loading guns, and two were entirely in favour of muzzle-loading. The two, he said, which were half in favour of muzzle-loading were Italy and Belgium, while Sweden and the United States were the two exclusively in favour of muzzle-loading. Well, no doubt, these were four important countries, though not such important countries from a military point of view as Russia, Germany, France, and Austria. But even as regarded these smaller Powers, he did think the present state of the case was now that which it was when the noble Lord made his statement. It might have been accurate at the time he made it; but he (Major Nolan) did not believe it was strictly accurate at the present moment. Now, take the case of Italy. That country had been steadily, for the last eight or nine years, replacing all her muzzle and her field artillery with breech-loading cannon. No doubt, last year she seemed to favour muzzle-loading, because she ordered four 100-ton guns in this country on that system; but he believed that those guns had since come into the possession of Her Majesty's Government. He did not know why Italy had parted with them, whether under pressure or not, or whether she was glad to get rid of them; but the fact remained she had those guns no longer, and she was not now so much in favour of muzzle-loading as she had been; in fact, she was going in about a fortnight's time to try a breech-loading gun larger than our 80-ton gun. Therefore he claimed Italy as being in favour of breech-loading. With regard to Belgium the case was this. That in those cases where she was best able to judge she was going in for breech-loaders. As to Sweden, she prided herself upon her cast-iron guns; and although the noble Lord last year quoted her as being exclusively in favour of muzzle-loading ordnance, that was no longer the case, and very lately she had decided to abandon muzzle-loading guns as her field guns and adopt breech-loading cannon. There then remained the case of the United States, which was a peculiar one. The United States determined upon a policy of the most rigid economy after her war, and they had of late scarcely made any new cannon whatever. She had made a few experiments, however. The great war left her as a legacy a large number of cast-iron guns, and she had altered these so as to make them better weapons by converting them into rifled cannon. On the whole it had been easier to turn these guns into muzzle-loaders than it would have been to have made them breech-loaders; but the whole scientific opinion of America, which was to be read in the Reports of the Directors of Naval and Military Ordnance in that country, seemed to be exclusively in favour of breech-loading guns. The Chief of the American Ordnance said whatever difference of opinion existed as to the relative efficiency of the breech and the muzzle-loading, the latter being exclusively used by England, and the former exclusively used by the great Continental Powers, there could be no question that in certain cases the breech-loading had peculiar advantages. Therefore, from what he had said it would be seen that the four Powers to which the noble Lord had alluded as being half in favour of the muzzle and only half in favour of the breech-loading system were rapidly getting round to be in favour of breech-loading as against the muzzle-loading. If that should prove to be so, England would be left without a single follower or supporter of any consequence in Europe in her system of ordnance, and they would be in a perfectly isolated position with their guns, if they continued to maintain that the muzzle-loading system was the best against the naval and military opinion of the whole of the rest of the world. What he (Major Nolan) proposed was that extensive experiments should be made by the Government with breech-loading guns, and with breech-loading guns only, because enormous experiments had already been made with muzzle-loading weapons. Herr Krupp had circulated a paper among many hon. Members of the House within the last week, in which he said that his 6½-inch gun had been tried against an English 9-inch gun, and his gun had given far better results. His main reason for advocating breech-loading for field artillery was that the breech-loader, from the great length of its bore, and from the fact that the chamber was of larger diameter than the bore, not only gave the gun a greater power and a longer range, but also diminished the danger to which artillerymen were usually exposed when charging the gun, inasmuch as they were entirely protected from the attack of small arms while they were engaged in that operation. This was shown to be the case very clearly in the Report of the special Committee some seven or eight years ago, although that Committee did not report in favour of breech-loading. It was demonstrated that there was far better cover for the men with the breech-loader. No experiments, however, were carried out at Shoeburyness to show which gun gave the most cover, so that the special advantage of the breech-loader was not proved to exist; and he hoped, when the noble Lord next made experiments, he would go into this point. If the two guns, a breech-loader and a muzzle-loader, were put in the open field, there would be no difference as to cover; but in intrenchments a very much superior protection was given by the breech-loader. When muzzle-loaders were adopted in this country, it was absolutely necessary that they should be made short, because it was more difficult to ram down charges in a long gun than in a short one; but now the whole tendency of modern artillery was to make guns longer, in order to render them more efficient.

Even if the muzzle-loader was improved in that respect, it would only be by imitating the special quality of the breech-loader—its very great depth; thus making the muzzle very clumsy and difficult to handle. He had seen the experiments at Shoeburyness as to cover for muzzle-loaders; but he was convinced there would be four or five times more men killed by small arms with the muzzle-loader than there would be in cases where the breech-loader was used. These, then, were the advantages of the breech-loader—the length of the gun, larger chamber for powder, and the great extent of cover. Therefore, this question of the character of English ordnance was a most serious one, and therefore it was that he pressed it upon the attention of the Government. He might refer to what was called the Thunderer system. There the cover was the same as with breech-loading; the gun itself stopped the port-hole, and prevented the fire of the enemy getting in at the men. Had the gun of the Thunderer been a breech-loader, it would have been impossible that it could have received a double charge, and its destruction would have been avoided. Such an accident was one which could not occur again for a long time to come, and he did not wish to make too much of it. The fact was, it was an accident inseparable from the construction of the gun and the mode of loading it. He did not believe the explosion was in any way due to a deficiency in the strength of the gun, which was almost bound to burst when loaded with two charges, inasmuch as the fact caused at least seven times the ordinary amount of pressure to be brought to bear at the point of bursting. Another strong objection to the system of muzzle-loading—and this also was shown in the case of the Thunderer—was that the gun was loaded at a distance from the firing detachment, the members of which could know nothing of what had been done, or of the danger to which they were, or might be, subjected. This was a necessary consequence of the system, and great care would be necessary to prevent a recurrence of similar disasters; but that would not do away with other evils that would inevitably crop up. He did not object to the use of hydraulic machinery, for with large guns it was very useful; but the fact of having the loading party

20 or 30 feet away from the firing party was a great defect, and one likely, as in the present case, to lead to accidents. Yet another danger arising from muzzle-loading ordnance was that the gun had to be loaded at one elevation; then raised to prevent the missile from falling out of the muzzle; and, in the third place, depressed to bring it to the proper elevation for firing. Thus, there were, at least, three changes in the elevation of a muzzle-loading gun from loading to firing, and this in itself was, in his opinion, a strong ground for objecting to the system altogether as compared with breech-loading. Another point was that, up to the present time, English artillerists had derived great benefit from being able to watch the systems in use in other countries; but this advantage was now withdrawn from them by reason of the fact that England now stood alone in the use of muzzle-loading ordnance, although such use was contrary to the practice of all Europe, and was opposed to the theories of civil engineers universally in the country. He would like to know on what authority the Government based its opinion? When the question had been raised before, the noble Lord opposite (Lord Eustace Cecil) had replied in general terms that his action had been based upon the advice of his official and professional advisers. But the only name given beyond the personal opinion of the noble Lord was that of Captain Nolan, and he thought the noble Lord ought not to shelter himself behind a cloud of names, but he should state the names of his advisers in this matter. If he had a distinct opinion from the Director General of the Ordnance that muzzle-loading guns were superior to breech-loading ones, that would, of course, be most valuable. If the noble Lord had a considerable body of scientific evidence in favour of muzzle-loading guns, he ought to name the officers who supplied it. At present they were going against the scientific practices of Germany, Austria, and America, and against engineering opinion also, and he thought that was most unfortunate. If they were going to retain the muzzle-loading principle, the country ought to know the evidence on which that decision had been arrived at, and the grounds on which it rested. The two systems could not co-exist together; but if the two were used alongside each other, breech-loaders would drive out muzzle-loaders. It was scarcely satisfactory; and it was to be hoped that on the present occasion the noble Lord would give the names of the gentlemen whose advice had guided him. It might, perhaps, be thought that he was a little pressing in bringing this subject before the House; but, as it was one which might possibly determine the issue of a battle by land or a naval engagement, it was, he thought, well worthy the consideration of the House of Commons. He was not now asking the noble Lord to introduce breech-loaders, but to have such exhaustive experiments made as would satisfy the House as to their value, and that could be done for £100,000 or £200,000, or a cost certainly not exceeding what was now being spent in adding to their muzzle-loading ordnance. It would be better to incur that expenditure than to proceed farther on their present course without well knowing what they were about. There was a very good opportunity for introducing them in some of the forts which required larger guns, and in which there was much practical difficulty in fitting in heavier muzzle-loaders—a difficulty which would vanish if they only put in breech-loaders. The hon. and gallant Member concluded by moving his Amendment.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he thought his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway (Major Nolan) had done good service by again, this Session, as in the previous one, bringing forward his Motion on the subject of breech-loading ordnance, and he should very much wish that his suggestion for instituting experiments on the subject of the relative merits of muzzle-loaders were adopted and carried into practice. On that account he should beg to second his Motion, in order that, when the time came for making the change from muzzle-loading to breech-loading pieces, at which the hon. and gallant Gentleman's remarks pointed, they might be in a position to make it with despatch and certainty. On the previous occasions when the change from muzzle-loaders to breech-loaders was carried out, the nation was hurried into a vast expense before the best and most suitable breech piece was perfected. Then, 11 years later, the change made from a breech-loader was equally hurried before the best kind of gun was ascertained; indeed, the nation escaped at great outlay in avoiding a brass rifled gun instead of the present iron and steel tube. He was sure that the noble Lord the Surveyor General of Ordnance would not fail to give the attention they deserved to the obviously intelligent and scientific recommendations of his hon. and gallant Friend, and that he would cause experiments to be carried out which would settle the question in which the country was so deeply interested—namely, as to the best kind of gun for the Army and the Navy. A nation like England ought to possess not only the best ships and army that could be formed or produced, but the best guns that scientific skill could devise. He trusted that what his hon. and gallant Friend had said as to the recently proposed 4-ton 6-inch gun would be borne in mind. It was a piece of ordnance perfectly well suited to the class of vessels which the present First Lord of the Admiralty had so wisely introduced into the Service. It was in every way so far superior to the gun of 64 cwt. with which the Lis was armed that it might be truly said, if adopted for that vessel of great speed, to double her power as a vessel of war. He would suggest to his hon. and gallant Friend to submit a programme of the experiments it was desirable to make, and to place a Resolution on the Paper of the House which would require the authorities to give their best attention to the subject. He was aware that the noble Lord was always willing to obtain information from hon. Members at either side of the House, and would not disregard the suggestions of his hon. and gallant Friend merely by reason of his not belonging to the Party of the present Government. What was required was not a hasty and sweeping, but a gradual change, so that the country might, after careful investigation, secure the best possible gun for the Army and the Navy.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the great difference which exists between our cannon and those which find favour with Foreign Powers calls for careful investigation, and that it would be unwise to further postpone experiments on such classes of breech-loading guns as are now possessed by other Powers,"

—(Major Nolan,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR JOHN HAY said, he did not wish to oppose the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member (Major Nolan), which he had brought forward with much practical knowledge and ability. The advance of science had, he admitted, altered the position of the question very much from that which it occupied when, on the then perfectly sound recommendation of the Ordnance Committee, muzzle-loading guns were adopted for both Services. The system of breech-loading had then great disadvantages, while the muzzle-loading gun had the advantages of cheapness and simplicity, the latter being of considerable advantage to the Naval Service. The breech-loading gun had a considerable number of different pieces of various kinds to be attended to, and a slight derangement disabled the gun and was the cause of accidents. The present system of breech-loading was, however, a vast improvement on the old. It was simple, and had the advantage of securing to them a longer gun, with increased charge and accuracy. These reasons induced him to concur with the hon. and gallant Gentleman in desiring that the subject should undergo consideration, and that, if necessary, further experiments should be made. The appointment of a Scientific Commission would probably answer every purpose. He hoped, however, it would be done in a more permanent manner than was suggested by the hon. and gallant Gentleman. He desired to see the Ordnance Select Committee re-established, which, consisting as it did of the ablest officers both of the Navy and Army, gave confidence to the Services in its inquiries and in its reports. He should prefer that, if re-established, it should be in such a manner as to insure the more frequent change of its members than formerly prevailed; either by the adoption of the five years' rule, or in any manner which the Secretary of State for War thought would introduce fresh blood into the Ordnance Select Committee. The fact of the noble Lord instituting such permanent Committee would give confidence and convey an assurance to the officers of both Services that the result of an impartial scientific investigation would be adopted.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, that the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) had rather sprung a mine upon him. He was not aware that the Motion would be brought on as it had been, as it was put down for the Army Estimates. He had, however, listened attentively to the able observations of the hon. and gallant Member; but while acknowledging their force, he must correct him on one point. He had represented his (Lord Eustace Cecil's) opinion as being in favour of muzzle-loaders. It was perfectly true that year after year he had defended the course taken by the Government, but for himself he had never expressed any opinion; and for the Government he could truly say that they were neutral in the matter, and that their great anxiety was to adopt that system which, on the whole, would be the best and most useful. The present Government found a certain system in use. That system was, after several years' inquiry, adopted by the Government who preceded them, and it was adopted at very great expense, after an expenditure of from £4,000,000 to £6,000,000 in experiments. It was supposed at that time—and he never heard any opinion to the contrary—that they had as good a gun as any in the world. No doubt, invention did not end there, and it was quite possible that a better gun on a different principle might be discovered; but that better gun did not seem at present to be forthcoming, and he would repeat that the country was now in possession of a good gun. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway had stated that other countries had got a better gun, and that they had adopted Messrs. Krupp's gun; but that was not, as he (Lord Eustace Cecil) showed on the 12th of March last, the case generally. No doubt, other Governments would keep their eyes open to see whether a better system could be discovered; but that was just what the War Department of this country were doing—they were watching for further improvements—and when found out, he ventured to assure the House that no time would be lost in testing any invention which promised to be of advantage to the country. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had suggested that he (Lord Eustace Cecil) should inform him of the names of the officers who advised him; but he really did not think that that was necessary, as the hon. and gallant Gentleman must be quite as, perhaps more, familiar with those names than he was. He knew the Director of Ordnance, and also the Head of the Gun Factory. They were all distinguished officers, very capable of dealing with the question. The Director of Ordnance had always said he was perfectly prepared to see introduced any improvement that could be carried out; he was neither a "muzzle-loader" nor a "breach-loader," but was anxious to obtain the best gun possible for the Service. However, there were very great difficulties in the way of making a sudden change. In gunnery, it was as true as in most other things—"the more haste, the worse speed." It was absolutely necessary that any new step should be taken with great caution, and that it should recommend itself not only to military, but also to naval opinion. He would not now follow the hon. and gallant Member in his remarks with regard to the accident on board the Thunderer, because at present the Papers bearing on the subject had not yet been presented to the House, and because it was impossible as yet to say what change in the present system, if any, naval opinion would recommend. It was quite possible that, in consequence of that accident, it might be thought necessary to introduce breach-loading guns into the turrets of their ships. It was not, however, for him to anticipate what might be done in that matter. All he could say about it was that he felt quite certain the Secretary of State for War would cordially co-operate with the First Lord of the Admiralty and naval opinion in this matter; and that if it should be found necessary to make any great change in their guns the Government would not shrink from doing it, but would do it cautiously, gradually, and, he hoped, thoroughly. He hoped the hon. and gallant Gentleman would not press the Government too hardly. Considerable stress was laid in some quarters on the Krupp system of breach-loading; but unless he was very much mistaken, there were other systems of breach-loading equal, if not superior, to it. The question would, no doubt, receive the fullest consideration from the

Lord Eustace Cecil

Heavy Gun Committee now sitting, and further experiments would probably be made if necessary. Two of their officers had been invited by Herr Krupp to attend some new experiments in Germany, and possibly their Report might point to some new invention in the Krupp system worthy of imitation. He could assure hon. Members that every effort was being made to keep up with public opinion in these matters all over Europe. At the same time, he thought it only right to remind the House that experiments in gunnery were extremely costly, and if they allowed a particular inventor to have his gun tested, they must extend the same indulgence, if not to all foreign, certainly to native inventors. The present system of muzzle-loading was only adopted after an immense amount of money had been expended, and still the inventors, as a body, were not satisfied. They never were, to whatever length the experiments were carried. Not anticipating any discussion of this nature, he had not brought any Papers with him; and he was, therefore, unable to go into the subject as fully as he might have done. He could only, in conclusion, repeat his assurance that as soon as a better gun was forthcoming they would not fail to introduce it. It was a mistake to suppose that a prejudice existed against breach-loaders in official circles. Indeed, as the hon. and gallant Member was no doubt aware, breach-loaders were in use to a certain extent both in their fortresses and on board ship, therefore the two systems had been working pari passu. He did not think there had been any unfair detracting of the breach-loading system; on the contrary, he believed there had been every desire to give the breach-loading system a perfectly fair trial, and that civilians and officers of the Army and Navy were all animated by one wish, which was to secure the best gun for the country.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—THE BRIGADE DEPOT SYSTEM.—RESOLUTION.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE rose to call attention to the brigade depot system, and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the Brigade Depot system requires amendment, as it is costly, unsatisfactory, and inadequate to the requirements of home and foreign service."

He said the system had completely failed to attain two objects with which it was introduced—the furnishing of drafts for foreign service, and the welding into one harmonious whole of the forces in the sub-district, so as to form a nucleus of instruction for all auxiliary forces. Instead of that, however, it had been found necessary, in the two cases of emergency that had just occurred, to draft large numbers of men from other regiments in order to make up the strength required. For instance, to fill up the regiments sent to the Afghan Frontier and the Cape the regiments at Aldershot had been denuded of their best men. Then, again, there was a preposterous superabundance of officers at some of the depôts; in some cases there were only 80 men fit for duty under one colonel, one major, four captains, and four subalterns—a great disproportion of officers to men, whose number was utterly insufficient for the purposes of instruction to the auxiliary forces of sub-district. The men ought to be raised to 900 at least, and then they would be able to furnish strength to the battalions if required for foreign service, and be a nucleus of instruction to the Militia regiment and Volunteer corps of sub-district. As regarded the cost of these depôts, it bore no relation to the money paid for the work done and the responsibility incurred by colonels with the Army; and the officers at the depôts were examples of idleness in the districts, which was very injurious. The whole cost of the depôts was £274,000—an enormous sum of money spent on an object which was a complete failure. This Estimate ought to be cut down this year. He begged to move the Motion which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “in the opinion of this House, the Brigade Depot system requires amendment, as it is costly, unsatisfactory, and inadequate to the requirements of home and foreign service,”—
(Major O’Beirne,)

—instead thereof.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT said, he was not aware that these debates were coming on that evening, nor he was sure were a large number of officers in the House, or they would have been present. He agreed with the hon. and gallant Member (Major O’Beirne) that the cost of brigade depôts was very disproportionate to the results obtained. The hon. and gallant Gentleman suggested that the number of men in the battalions should be increased to 900. No doubt, they would then be of much more use for the purpose for which they were intended; but surely, if the number of men were increased, it was only reasonable to ask that the number of depôts should be reduced. The fact was that a mistake was made in establishing so many depôts, and all soldiers, if not all Members of Parliament, were agreed that, however good the design might have been, the territorial principle was not exactly adapted to the size of England, nor to their habits and institutions. The brigade depot system, it was perfectly true, had failed entirely as regarded the localization of regiments. It could never have been otherwise, for as soon as the two regiments at a depot centre were filled up, all the recruits were taken away for general service, and sent anywhere all over the country. Again, in some of these centres recruiting was actually at a standstill—had never, indeed, even begun; while in others a very large number of recruits were obtained. This showed that the system did not and could not work well everywhere. He did not quite agree with the hon. and gallant Member about the idleness of the officers. That depended a good deal upon the character of the commanding officer. He knew one depot where the objection was the other way, and the duties of the officers were discharged with 20 or 30 men in precisely the same manner as if there had been 900 men in barracks. No doubt that was going too far, and was a mistake of the commanding officer; but, on the other hand, where there were few men, the officers usually had very little to do. If the regiments were kept up to a sufficient strength of officers, he was not sure that it was not a good thing for a certain number of those officers to have a pleasant and an easy time as they might have at the depôts. His principle always had been, and he commended it to everybody else, to make the Service as pleasant as it could be, so long as it was combined with a careful discharge of duty. He believed it would be more carefully discharged if every facility were given to officers and men to be employed and amused. There was one little point he should like to bring to the notice of his right hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Stanley), in which he thought a good deal of expense might be saved, and that was in the case of recruits proceeding on foreign service. They were enlisted for foreign service at, let them suppose, Cardiff. If the home battalion was serving in some remote part of the country, as Scotland, and the other battalion was abroad, it was thought necessary to send these recruits up to Scotland, and then to bring them down again to Southampton and Portsmouth to embark them for India. As he was not aware that this debate was coming on, he did not fortify himself by looking at the Returns, to which reference had been made, and he did not even know how many dépôts had been established; but he hoped his right hon. and gallant Friend would think once, twice, and thrice before he began to carry out the system where it was not already in operation. In his opinion, the general feeling of officers of the Army would be decidedly in favour of the modification rather than the extension of this system of brigade dépôts.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he, too, like the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Arbuthnot), had come down to the House unprepared to give figures on these matters. He had no right to complain that the hon. and gallant Member (Major O'Beirne) had brought forward this Motion on the present occasion; but he feared he could not give him a full answer. But, inasmuch as he had had some rather intimate acquaintance with the subject, he hoped to be able to show the hon. and gallant Member why some of the objections he entertained were not altogether valid, and why they could not very easily or lightly depart from the system which had been some time settled. To begin with, the hon. and gallant Gentleman left out of sight, for purposes of argument, that the objects of the so-called brigade depot system were not limited in their effect to the Army. Although the Army was now the primary consideration, its object as laid down by the late Secretary of State for War (Viscount Cardwell), was not only to form a training depot for every pair of battalions, one of which was on foreign service and the other on duty at home, but also to serve as storehouses for reserve stations where Militia recruits might train in all seasons of the year, and camping places for the Volunteers. He was not prepared to concede that these brigade dépôts had wholly missed their original object. With regard to the disproportion between officers and men, at first sight he would be very much disposed to agree with the hon. and gallant Member. But it would be recollected that when they were considering the point, and obtained Returns from the authorities, they found the number of officers returned for duty at the dépôts by no means disproportioned to the men. When it came to be reduced to a matter of actual fact, there was not in the majority of cases much incongruity. But in some cases there did appear to be an excessive number, and the Committee over which he had the honour to preside recommended that those officers should, as far as possible, be sent to rejoin their battalions. As regarded the number of men, there was nothing which, as Secretary of State for War, would rejoice him more than to see the dépôts extended to the full size of 900 men; but this would mean a fine addition of 40,000 to the Army, and it was, therefore, hardly necessary to discuss it at the present moment. But, apart from this, if they had this large number of men tied up at these little dépôts, they would be precisely undoing the object of late years, which had been, not to split regiments up apart from one another at country places, but to bring them together in large camps for better instruction, and in order to teach them the duties they must fulfil when they formed part of a large army. The number of the dépôts was a subject on which he did not feel indisposed to speak, for he believed this was one of the very objections he, the late Colonel Anson, and others, had raised when the measure had been first proposed by Viscount Cardwell in that House. His opinion at that time had been that it would be far better not to split the men into such small detachments, but to have fewer and larger centres and more ground. From that opinion he had seen no reason to depart. But, on the other hand, he was bound to say that any alteration of these centres was not a thing to be lightly undertaken. If they called to mind the number of days and nights that had been spent in the discussion of this localization scheme, they would feel bound to admit that it was one thoroughly accepted on the part of the country, and that the money for it had been voted with open eyes. As to the disturbance of these centres, if it could be shown that, without expense, certain depôts could be reduced without any loss, either direct or indirect, to the country, that was an obvious matter of administration with which anyone would be prepared to deal. But, as a matter of fact, when Viscount Cranbrook acceded to Office, he found in almost all these places either the contracts so far advanced, or the depôts themselves so far proceeded with, that he scarcely had the power, without throwing away good money after bad, to alter the original system. Again, why should they turn back, after having gone half-way, in a scheme which was decided on by Parliament, for which Parliament had voted large sums of money, and when the purposes for which the money had been voted had been only half fulfilled? He confessed he would shrink from the responsibility of lightly asking Parliament to depart from the scheme. There might be small points of administration, here and there, which might be remedied; but if hon. Members looked upon these depôts as being so many men required for duty, they altogether failed of their purpose; they were depôts, and did not purport to be battalions. Perhaps, at another time, it might be his duty to touch on some points where he thought some remedy might still be required; but he was certainly not prepared to go as far as the hon. and gallant Member. The uneven number of recruits was always a difficulty in this country. It was impossible that centres of recruiting should coincide with the depôts; but the distances between the two were short. There could be no doubt that the depôts had served their original purpose of supplying more centres of recruiting than there had been before. He would mention one other point. One of the great complaints of late years had been that the stores were too much centralized. Now, it was quite evident in the late mobilization that the more they were making use of the storehouses at the depôts to distribute the stores, the better was the service of mobilization likely to be performed. He, therefore, could not see any reason for departing from this brigade-depôt system, at least, so far as the centres themselves were concerned.

MR. WHITWELL thought the brigade depôts were exercising a very beneficial influence. They were more or less affecting the whole body of the Volunteer Forces. He hoped that brigade depôts would soon become the means of affording instruction to the Volunteers.

Question put, and agreed to.

PUBLIC BUSINESS—QUESTION OF PROCEDURE.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. RYLANDS : I desire, Sir, before you leave the Chair, to enter a protest on the part of independent Members against the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in making his Statement on the Motion that you do leave the Chair instead of in Committee of Supply. While, of course, I do not presume to say that the right hon. Gentleman was out of Order, yet the course he has taken is one which, in my recollection, is entirely unprecedented, and one which has exposed the House to a very considerable amount of inconvenience. The right hon. Gentleman has brought in what in effect is a third Budget for the present financial year. That, in itself, is most unexampled, and in consequence of the extraordinary step taken to-night it has been followed by a Motion on going into Committee, which has led to a discussion of matters entirely apart from the financial proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It is quite clear, if the right hon. Gentleman had adopted the usual course in moving that you, Sir, do leave the Chair, without making any observations, then the Motion on going into Committee would have come forward in due course, and the right hon. Gentleman would then have made his Statement with the Chairman of Committees in the Chair. The discussion in that event would have proceeded in a regular and orderly manner; but, as it is, I am doubtful whether even on the Vote, which will be put from the Chair when we have resolved ourselves into Committee, I should not be precluded from making general observations which appear to me to have been called forth.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has taken a course to-night which I feel myself—and I believe I am not alone in that opinion—is calculated to confuse the mind of the House. If the House of Commons is to possess any efficient control over the Expenditure and over the taxation of this country, it is quite clear that they ought to have a full Statement, in regard to the Expenditure and taxation, placed before them in an explicit and ample manner by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the occasion of his moving the Budget for the year. But he has not done so. The Chancellor of the Exchequer came down with a Budget at the usual time of the Session, and he gave the House to understand what would be the Expenditure of the financial year; and he laid before the House certain proposals as to the taxes he intended to levy during the year. We were supposed to base our judgment and opinion upon the Budget as stated. But what do we find? That the Estimates of the right hon. Gentleman prove in the course of a very few months to be utterly delusive. You find the right hon. Gentleman coming down to the House from time to time, no doubt with sincerity, but under the influence of a very large organ of hope, and in the most sanguine manner, anticipating that the Expenditure would be less, and the Revenue greater than it has subsequently proved. Thus, after the first Budget had been found to be delusive, and after the right hon. Gentleman had taken another unprecedented course, of laying upon the Table of the House a scheme embracing the ordinary and extraordinary Expenditure—a scheme alike confusing to the country and the House—he came down with a second Budget. The Government shirked new taxation, so the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to borrow, admitting that the Expenditure was getting beyond the sums that he had anticipated. Again, he had hopes for the future, which had not been realized. We have now a third Budget, and again we find that the Chancellor of the Exchequer comes down to the House and tells us that the Expenditure is greater than he had estimated, and that the taxes have not realized what he expected. The result of all is that he has landed us in a financial difficulty, which I do not hesitate to say is without example in recent years. The system of borrowing cannot go on for ever. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has put off the evil day as long as possible, and the time is fast approaching when he will have to impose additional taxes upon the country. What will be the inevitable effect of the Statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in bringing his third Budget before the public? It will be this—that persons engaged in large mercantile operations—persons interested in tea, spirits, and tobacco—will go in for heavy operations in the anticipation of some additional taxation on one or other of these articles. Such operations will certainly cause men engaging in them very great inconvenience, and the passage of a large and unusual quantity of goods through the Customs will give to the Chancellor of the Exchequer a large amount of Revenue this year which does not belong to the year. Present appearances of Revenue will, of course, be improved; but next year will not present so favourable an aspect. Those connected, as I am, with the commerce of the country, have a right to complain of the Statement made to-night, and a right to assert that there should be no delay in laying before the House the Budget for the coming financial year. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) has shown that it has always been the custom, when there was a large deficiency, for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to come down immediately and state the facts of the case in Committee of Ways and Means. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer does what he now proposes, he will not only do serious injury to the commerce of the country, but he will be setting up another precedent which it is undesirable to pursue. I do not desire to occupy the House longer than necessary, but I have one remark to make which I could not well make in Committee. The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that he intended to apply a sum of £400,000 to the military operations in South Africa, which had been provided by savings in other Departments of the State. Now, I wish to point out to the right hon. Gentleman that this is a clear case of a transfer of sums voted by this House for particular purposes to other purposes not contemplated by the House at the time the money was voted. I think it a most objectionable course, although a legal one, to be adopted. Let me put this to the right hon. Gentleman. It might have happened that if he had come down to the House for a Supplementary Vote for the expenses of the South African War, the policy and conduct of the Government with regard to that war might have been fairly challenged. The Government, by taking the course they had pursued, had prevented any consideration by the House of the transactions of an important part of the Imperial policy. They had escaped any challenge of their policy in consequence of the Treasury giving authority to the Army Department to transfer sums of money which had been voted out of the funds granted in this House under entirely different conditions to entirely different objects. That £400,000, so granted by this House, had been taken with the sanction of the Treasury to pay for the South African War. I say that the control of Parliament in such matters does seem very much like a farce. I am not prepared to say that under no circumstances ought such a transfer to be allowed; for I know that if a rule was laid down too stringently, there might be a certain amount of public disadvantage; but if this system is to be so largely adopted I contend that, whatever may be the inconvenience to the Departments, the House of Commons ought to be determined to put a stop to it. I wish it to be understood that £400,000, voted for certain specified purposes, has been expended in war, and this has been done without Parliament being consulted in the matter. I must apologize for intervening between the House and its going into Committee of Supply. I should certainly not have done so had not the right hon. Gentleman thought it right to depart from a practice of this House without the consent of the House.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—EXCHEQUER BONDS.

(1.) £2,750,000 Exchequer Bonds.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had been so much criticized for irregularity that he hardly knew whether he was justified in taking notice in Committee of observations which were made out of it; and, in fact, he doubted whether he should be justified in making any Statement except as to the particular Vote before the Committee. He also, with some hesitation, referred to the other questions which had been raised, and he hoped he was in Order in doing so. He did think, however, that he was consulting the convenience of the House in making the Statement he did. In the first place, there undoubtedly had been occasions—several occasions—on which Budgets had been brought forward earlier in the year than the present time. He did not know whether all the cases which had been mentioned were exactly in point, because the change made in 1854 in the date of the financial year affected some of them, though he did not wish to insist very much upon that. At the same time, he was quite sure that there were inconveniences, and always had been, in making a Budget Statement prematurely. That inconvenience had been very much increased of late by the change made in collecting the Revenue. The great charge of the Income Tax fell upon the third and fourth quarters of the year, and there was great difficulty in estimating with accuracy what the whole amount of the tax would be. Of course, there was a similar difficulty with other sources of taxation; but he referred especially to the Income Tax. He thought his right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Childers) would agree with him that though it might be inconvenient, and undoubtedly was inconvenient, to the public to have any delay occur in making the Financial Statement of the year known, yet that it would be almost more inconvenient that an imperfect Statement should be made prematurely, necessitating fresh arrangements afterwards. There was considerable difficulty, at the present time, in estimating, not merely the Revenue for next year, but the Expenditure also. This latter must depend very much upon what they might have to pay for the operations in South Africa; and at the present moment, and until they got the next fortnight's despatches, of course, it would be extremely difficult to know for what sum it would be necessary to make provision. Therefore, it would hardly be consistent with certainty in taxation if they were to attempt to introduce a Budget at so early a date as the beginning of March. For these reasons, he had suggested that they should wait until the beginning of April for his financial propositions. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Childers) had rather exaggerated the position in which they stood. He said it was the gravest and the greatest since the time of the first Reform Bill. That, he thought, was a statement calculated to alarm the public mind quite unnecessarily.

MR. CHILDERS said, that was not quite his statement. He said it was the most serious deficit since the first Reform Bill.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he did not agree with the right hon. Gentleman in that opinion; but he would not discuss that point for the present. However, if it had not been for the South African War the arrangements he had made last year would have been sufficient, and it would have been unnecessary for him to make any Financial Statement at all. He now had to propose a Vote for the renewal of those Bonds which were issued for the Service of the year 1877-8. He had hoped they might have been able to pay off a portion of these Bonds in the present year. They had not been able to do so, partly on account of the deficiency in the Revenue, partly on account of the greater demand for Expenditure; and he had, therefore, no other alternative but to make provision for meeting these Bonds when they fell due on the 16th, and the following days of March. He hoped the Committee would see that in making these propositions they were only carrying into effect the contemplated arrangements.

MR. DODSON said, the right hon. Gentleman had just told them that it would not have been necessary for him to come down to the House and ask for power to make any alteration in the arrangements he proposed last year had it not been for the breaking out of the war in South Africa. That was a very important qualification, and bore very materially upon the plan of finance put before them in the month of August last. In that month the right hon. Gentleman contemplated an excess of Expenditure over Revenue for the current year of £1,556,000, and, adding to that the deficit which he would have to provide for of the Exchequer Bonds for Expenditure in connection with the Vote of Credit incurred in 1877-8, left him with a deficit of £4,806,000. The right hon. Gentleman said he proposed to spread that over the next two years, and, assuming that his Revenue for the next two years continued the same as in the current year, plus £600,000, the additional amount of the new 2d. on the Income Tax, and that his expenditure continued the same, minus the expenses incurred in connection with Turkish affairs, he hoped to be able in each of the two years to pay off, roughly speaking, £2,000,000 of Debt, and thus, in the two years, to wipe off the £4,000,000 odd of deficit. The right hon. Gentleman justified his action by saying that if this was not actually war expenditure it was next door to war expenditure, for it was the cost of averting war. If, however, the cost of averting war was to be treated as war expenditure, he did not know where they were to stop. In one sense, the whole cost of the Army and Navy was the cost of averting war, for they were intended to guard them—to protect them—against war. Unfortunately, this expenditure for averting war proved, in the case of Afghanistan at least, to be rather the cost of provoking war. It could not be doubted, indeed, that the policy pursued in regard to Turkey led to the Afghanistan War. Then the right hon. Gentleman, on the assumption that his Revenue and Expenditure would continue the same, spread his deficit over the two coming years. But he had been singularly unfortunate, because since that time he had had two fresh wars—the Afghanistan War and the Zulu War. He was not then going to discuss the policy of the Government, or to lay any blame upon the right hon. Gentleman; but the course he had taken did show the danger of spreading the so-called cost of averting a war over future years, and trusting that the future years would be so uneventful as to enable them to pay off such arrears. The right hon. Gentleman had certainly met with singular ill-fortune in having the Zulu War and the Afghanistan War come upon him. Besides this, the right hon. Gentleman had told them that he was about to propose a loan to India of £2,000,000 without interest. He would not stop to discuss whether that would not, in reality, be a gift; but, in any case, the money would have to be provided. Therefore, in addition to the deficit of £4,306,000, they had also to face a proposition for £1,500,000 for the Zulu War, something over £354,000 for the Supplementary Civil Service Estimates, and the prospect of a loan of £2,000,000, without interest, to India. The right hon. Gentleman had also told them what they must have all been exceedingly sorry to hear—that the Revenue was likely to fall short of the estimate by something not much less than £1,000,000. He was afraid, looking at the Revenue Returns, that that shortcoming would be, at all events, in great part upon the three most important heads of finance—Customs, Excise, and Stamps. At the close of the third quarter, the receipts from these three heads were £200,000 behind the receipts for the same period in the previous year. But, at the present time, according to the Return up to February 22, the falling off was £371,000; or, in other words, the falling off, during the last seven or eight weeks, had almost doubled. It must be remembered that the right hon. Gentleman, instead of calculating on a falling off, had reckoned on a considerable increase under two of these heads, for he had calculated on an increased Revenue from Customs of £531,000; from Excise, including the additional dog duty, of £136,000; and a decrease on Stamps of £26,000. Therefore, while he had reckoned on an increase by the 31st of March next of £641,000, he had instead, up to the present time, a decrease of £371,000. It was obvious that, unless these three important heads of Revenue much improved, the right hon. Gentleman would be £1,000,000 short of his calculations. He dared say that the Revenue would come in better, as it often had done before, just before the close of the financial year; but still the prospect was, as these three important heads of Revenue were falling off with remarkable rapidity, that they would disappoint the expectations of the right hon. Gentleman; and the fact that this falling off had been recently so rapid did not promise well for the Income of the next year. He wished to call attention to one other point with regard to the new Sinking Fund, established in 1875.

The right hon. Gentleman, by means of that Sinking Fund, paid off in the first year £280,150; in the second year, £624,780; and in the third year, £764,825, making a total paid off in the three years during which the Fund had been in operation of £1,669,755. But in the course of the same three years the Debt had been increased by a larger amount than the total amount paid off; therefore, while they had been paying off the Debt with one hand, they had been adding to it with the other. The money, in fact, by which it had been paid off had been borrowed for the purpose, or if not actually so borrowed, was withdrawn from Revenue, at the cost of leaving a corresponding amount of Expenditure to be met by borrowed money. The result was an increase in the Debt, funded and unfunded. The right hon. Gentleman estimated, in his Budget last April, that he would pay off in the current year, by means of that Sinking Fund, £684,747. He would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman whether he would not apply that money to meet part of his deficit, seeing that he must borrow so much the more if he were going to keep the Fund up. Of course, if the operation of the Sinking Fund were a continuous one, with a definite object to be attained in a definite time, it might be worth while not, even temporarily, to hinder its progress. But as this was not the case, and as the proposition simply was to provide so much surplus each year in order to pay off a certain amount of Debt, it seemed to him, when no such surplus was provided, an illusory and useless operation to continue it. Without expressing any definite opinion, he would merely suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it would not be a wise thing to suspend the action of the Sinking Fund for the current year, at all events until they saw what their prospects were?

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR suggested to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he should put into the financial accounts every year a statement showing by whom these Exchequer Bonds and Bills were held. He could tell him frankly that, by allowing the very large amount of unfunded Debt to exist without making the public acquainted with the way in which it was held, he had done himself much harm, as one of their ablest financiers, and lowered the national credit, because the public was not acquainted with the fact that these Bonds and Bills were at present mainly in the hands of the Commissioners of the National Debt and the Bank. They amounted to £14,500,000, leaving about £5,000,000 only in the form of Treasury Bills in the hands of the public. But, as nobody knew where they were, it was assumed that all were mainly in the hands of the public; and until they had heard the Statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it was generally assumed that this kind of indebtedness, known as the Floating Debt, must end in the issue of Consols, and with this notion the rise in price had been checked of this kind of securities. If the right hon. Gentleman would publish the statement to which he had referred, it would do much to insure that steadiness in the Money Market which was so essential. With regard to the plea urged for delaying the Budget till after the close of the year, he very much regretted the assigned cause being the change that had taken place of late years in the mode of collecting the Revenue from the Income and Property Tax. Appeals of the strongest character were made to the late Chancellor of the Exchequer not to do it, but in vain; and then appeals were made to the late Prime Minister, but he did not feel himself justified in interfering to stop the unwise project of his Chancellor of the Exchequer. Therefore, the right hon. Gentleman had, he thought, some right to urge that the mode of collecting this Revenue by which the larger portion of this tax was collected in the last quarter of the year, had placed them in their present position of being unable till the year closed of dealing with the Estimates for the year ensuing. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would deal with the deficiency in a bold and statesmanlike manner. Within one year this Floating Debt had increased by £7,000,000. It was not safe to allow of further increase, and it would be preferable to reduce the amount. He hoped, if necessary, he would ask not only for 1*d.* but 2*d.* more on the Income Tax, and that he would not any longer run the great danger of leaving this heavy burden of a dangerous kind of Debt hanging over them.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he should like to know how this money was to be raised. He hoped it would not be carried beyond next year, and that the matter would be dealt with in the Budget.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the money would be raised by Exchequer Bonds, which would only be current for a year; and when he brought in the Budget he would make a statement concerning the manner of providing for them.

(2.) £1,500,000, War in South Africa (Vote of Credit).

MR. PARNELL said, he merely rose to protest against the Vote of this sum of money. Of course, he was aware that no protest of his would have the slightest effect; but he felt, on the other hand, that he would not be discharging the duty he owed to himself and his constituents if he did not protest against this most unjust and flagitious war. They had deliberately invaded a country inhabited by people who had done them no harm, and they had, for several years, deliberately prepared this invasion. It had been the policy of Her Majesty's Government to provoke this war, in order that it might annex portions of the territory of these Zulus. At the time of the annexation of the Transvaal this tendency of theirs was pointed out, and it was shown clearly, and proved, as far as anything could be proved, that if the Transvaal were annexed the next step must be the annexation of a portion of the lands of the enemy. Of course, the Colonial Governor was carefully instructed as to his duties, as to how he was to get up this little war, and the name of humanity was put to shame by the proceedings of the Government. Then, after the way had been carefully prepared, and after excuses had been carefully got ready, troops were sent into the country, and these people were attacked. He knew that the disaster which had recently befallen the troops would compel the re-instatement of the military position; and, so far as that went, he supposed nobody would object to that. But he did not apprehend, from the temper he had recently seen displayed by the people of this country, that the Government would be satisfied with the recovery of the military position. On the contrary, he supposed the Government would proceed to carry out their original intentions with regard to attacking the country. Of course, it was now clear that the panic and the alarm sedulously got up when the news first arrived of the massacre of a battalion of the 24th, and that Natal was in danger, were utterly groundless, and that the Forces on the spot were perfectly capable of defending the Colony against any attack from the Zulus. The resistance of Lieutenants Bromhead and Chard, at the head of only 80 men, after they had had time to entrench themselves in a very slight and scanty manner, showed that the Zulus were perfectly incapable of conducting an offensive campaign against our troops. These enormous preparations, and the dispatch of these thousands of men, meant neither more nor less than a premeditated determination to annex that country, as the Transvaal had already been annexed. He supposed that there would be no quarter given to these savages, as, in accordance with their savage nature, they had given none; that the sword would go amongst them, and that their villages would be burned, as they had burned the villages of the unfortunate people in Afghanistan. These poor people had displayed instincts which, in other nations, were supposed to indicate heroism, for they had endeavoured to defend their country against the attacks of foreigners and strangers. He would not go through the form of dividing the House; but he would again protest against the application of this money to what he was sure would be a war of annexation and extermination.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he could not allow one charge brought by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) against Her Majesty's troops to pass unanswered. The hon. Member had said that no doubt their troops in South Africa would have received orders that no quarter should be given; but that was very far from being the case, as would be seen from the examination of a document already published, but which had not, as yet, been laid upon the Table of the House. The document to which he (Sir John Hay) alluded was an order of the late Lieutenant Governor at the Cape, Sir Arthur Cunynghame, and it contained the most positive instructions, not only to British troops, but to the ordinary Native levies, both to give quarter, and, if possible, to make prisoners in battle, instead of the course suggested as likely to be pursued by the officers and men of Her Majesty's Army by the hon. Member who had just sat down. He (Sir John Hay) could not have imagined that any hon. Member would have expressed such an opinion at once to the House, the Committee, and the country. That suggestion was entirely unfounded, and one which it would be seen could not possibly be carried into effect. The hon. Member had further said that Her Majesty's Government had conceived this scheme of spoliation and war; but he (Sir John Hay) believed that the South African War had come upon them as a matter of great surprise. If the hon. Member would read the despatches and Blue Book, it would be found that there was not a single instance of any order from Her Majesty's Government to carry the war into the Zulu country. On the contrary, so far from there existing any desire to carry fire and sword into that country, the arbitration which had been held, under that distinguished Governor, Sir Bartle Frere, had resulted in the arrangement that a very considerable portion of territory, which had been in dispute, should be conveyed back to the Zulus. Pending the further opportunity of discussing the question of the war, he thought that the study of the publications he had referred to was desirable, as they certainly did not bear out the statements of the hon. Member for Meath.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he thought it undesirable that any debate should be taken upon the causes of the war at that moment; but he could not help expressing his surprise that a Vote of such enormous importance should be submitted to the House without any explanation or statement whatever on the part of the Government. The £1,500,000 just asked for was but for two months' expenses of a war which might attain a great magnitude. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: No, no!] It was for expenses up to the 31st of March; it was a Vote for beginning a war, the end of which they did not see. But whether the inception of the war were just or unjust, it was a fact, and must be carried to a conclusion—namely, the entire disarming of the Potentate with whom it was being waged. A great distinction was to be drawn between wars of such different characters as the late Kaffir War, which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had called the Transkei War, and the present Zulu War. His impression and experience was, that when they had districts of savage and unruly tribes, wholly surrounded by British territory, the best course was to take them in hand, conquer, and bring them entirely under British control. In that view he considered that the Kaffir War might be a good job; and if the expense was not excessive, he might not object to the result, on the express condition that henceforward the Cape Colony should undertake the wars within its own borders, and that Kaffraria should be treated as part of the Cape Colony which should bear the cost of its own defence. On the other hand, the Zulu War was one of a totally different character. In that case they were not forced by circumstances to attempt the conquest of a bit of territory, but were undertaking the conquest of a great Kingdom upon the borders of our Colony, beyond which extended the whole Continent of Africa, with its enormous population. They were, consequently, brought face to face with the great question—were they to be forced to go on more and more into that great Dominion in Africa against their will, just as they were formerly forced to go into the great Dominion of India? He felt surprise and regret that it had been found necessary to employ only their finest regiments in the present somewhat ignoble war against savages, and that no assistance had been derived from the Indian Army. The Native Indian soldiers were, in his opinion, admirably well fitted for the kind of work now on hand in South Africa. If, instead of making an unfortunate demonstration at Malta and Cyprus, and allowing their Representative in India to entangle his troops in Afghanistan, Her Majesty's Government had been able to move a brigade or division of their best Indian troops into Africa, the war might have been carried on and concluded without that destruction of the power and sinew of the country, which he knew very well had resulted, and must result, from what he must call this ignoble war. He was not sanguine that the people at the Cape would be willing to undertake the responsibility of government with respect to the Zulus by consenting to federation when the war was over, for it was their opinion that they had already enough to do within their own borders. He did not think they would be willing to relieve us of the expense and responsibility of future wars in the interior of South Africa. They had a large Native population to deal with, whilst they were separated at present by British Colonies, and the Orange Free State, from places in which they had no concern. If the Cape Colony would not, the Colonies of Natal and the Transvaal could not undertake to deal in a fitting manner with the Native African population, especially now that they were supplied with arms from the Portuguese Coast—they were without the resources needful for the prosecution of great wars. But while these Colonies were not able to carry on war on their own account, they had, on the other hand, enormous temptations to get the British Government to carry it on for them. The present war would be enormously profitable to the people of Natal. Sir Arthur Cunynghame's Book showed this. He had seen lately that the carriage of 1 cwt. of goods from Durban to the capital of Natal had run up from 2s. 6d. to 15s. 6d. He noticed in the Estimate that there was only £200,000 for the cost of Naval transport, while £1,200,000 was devoted to the military charges, almost the whole of which would go into the pockets of the Colonists, who had the greatest inducements to promote war for the sake of the profit accruing to them. Another reason why the Colonists were inclined to war was, that they were habitually wont to carry it on in the form of a cattle raid; and during the first 10 days of the present Zulu War the troops were engaged in collecting many thousand head of cattle from the peaceful villages, which they afterwards divided among themselves in the name of loot. There was another important point about which he would say a few words, and that was the land system now prevailing in South Africa, which gave another and very strong inducement to the Colonies to engage in war. He asked hon. Members to compare the present Colonial land system with the wise policy pursued in the United States, where the lands were reserved in the power of the Government as a means of forming new Colonies. Of all the monopolists of land, he was quite sure that the South African Colonists were the greatest. And it was their habit not only to divide the whole land which they could appropriate, but to encroach upon the land of their neighbours. Hon. Members might observe that these Colonists had a habit of dealing in what they called farms; but the term had a very different meaning in South Africa to what it had here; for there a farm consisted of at least 6,000 acres—indeed, farms out there might reach a maximum of more than 20,000 acres. Such were the farms in the Transvaal, where every boy who attained the age of 16 years was entitled to one of 6,000 acres and upwards. Sir Arthur Cunynghame told them that the demand for farms was such that the authorities of the Transvaal were obliged to appropriate their neighbours land in order to distribute it among the rising population. The farms, of course, could not be cultivated by boys of 16, and the consequence was that they were sold for a song, and got into the hands of monopolists, who left none for new Colonists. He was not prepared to say that it might not be a wise and merciful policy to establish their rule over greater regions in South Africa; but that they should not leave it in the power of the Colonists to job away the land. He asked the other day a gentleman travelling who came from the Cape — “Why they did not get more Colonists in South Africa?” And the reply was—“The real fact is that we have no land to offer them; it has all been jobbed away.” He (Sir George Campbell) impressed on Her Majesty's Government the advantage of carrying out the wise policy of the United States of reserving the land in the power of the Central Government, and not letting it fall into the hands of jobbing Colonists. By those means they might be able to settle a Colonial population, and so free themselves from the great burden of future wars. It appeared to him that if we must advance in South Africa, one of two policies must be followed—either the government of the country under a despotic system, like that of India, or the establishment of free Colonies, which might be capable of relieving the Home Government by taking upon themselves their own burdens.

There was a good deal to be said in favour of the acquisition of land in South Africa. If this were fairly dealt with, it would become an admirable outlet for the younger sons and brothers of the upper and middle classes in this country, for whom it was sometimes difficult to make provision, and who were not prepared to do that which must be done by those who wished to succeed in America—namely, to work with their own hands. They might have the assistance of Native labour.

MR. ASSHETON rose to Order. He could not see that the land question had anything to do with the Motion before the Committee.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL would not trouble the Committee longer. When the hon. Member for Clitheroe (Mr. Assheton) called him to Order, he was just coming to the end of his speech. He implored Her Majesty's Government to look the question in the face, and feel that they had part in a great war—he would not add of conquest and annexation. He should be happy if the question were dealt with in a large and serious spirit, and the land question made the means of colonization and improvement, instead of jobbery and profit.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, he would not attempt to follow the hon. Member who had just sat down (Sir George Campbell), as it required a much cleverer man than himself (Sir Henry Holland) to see any connection between the subjects introduced by the hon. Member and that before the Committee. The institutions of the United States of America on the land question had nothing whatever to do with the question under discussion; but in listening to the hon. Gentleman when he was showing us how to govern Zululand, he was struck with the truth of the old advice “to hatch your eggs before you nurse your chickens.” He (Sir Henry Holland), however, rose to correct the statement of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), who said that this country had annexed the Transvaal with a view to the subsequent annexation of Zululand. Nothing was more contrary than this to the view of the Government. The Transvaal was annexed because the Dutch were in constant collision with the Zulus, from which resulted danger to the peace, lives, and property of our Colonists. In April, 1877, after the annexation, we sent to Cetewayo to inform him that in the case of any aggression having been made on his territory we were prepared to have the whole question considered, and the question of disputed territory properly arbitrated upon. This proposition was agreed to, and very able and experienced men were sent to examine thoroughly the question of disputed territory. An award was made, by which we were enabled to hand over to the Zulus a large portion of territory unfairly annexed by the Boers. He (Sir Henry Holland) had, therefore, the right to say that the observation of the hon. Member for Meath as to our reasons for the annexation of the Transvaal was certainly without foundation.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON would be glad if Her Majesty's Government would state, by way of explanation, to the House what had become of that vast amount of warlike stores prepared last year in view of another war. Of the £3,000,000 voted last year, the sum of £987,500 was spent upon two items under this head. He wished to know why the shot and ammunition, the appliances and warlike stores were not available for the purposes of the war in South Africa? He thought the House was entitled to a statement, showing how the Supplies granted last year were disposed of, and trusted that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, or the noble Lord the Surveyor General of Ordnance (Lord Eustace Cecil), would favour them with an explanation.

MR. DILLWYN said, that the hon. and gallant Member who had just sat down (Sir Alexander Gordon) had urged the Government to give an explanation of the expenditure of Supplies voted last year. He felt bound to support him in that request. He only wished to add, that he failed to see why the Government had not employed Indian troops in the South African War, as they had recently done in the Mediterranean and at Cyprus. Whether the policy of the Government was right or wrong was an important question; but the present was not the proper time for discussing it. It appeared to him that the House required much fuller particulars in order to be able to form a correct opinion of the war now being waged, and, therefore, that discussion should be delayed until such particulars had been received. He thought that the urgency of the case did not allow of contention in the matter of granting the money asked for; and his only reason for rising was to say that the agreement to the Vote by hon. Members on this side of the House must not be taken as an approval of the general policy of Her Majesty's Government in South Africa. So far as he was able to judge from the information before the House, he thought that Government were not justified in embarking in these wars. As to what fell from the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay), he wished to observe that the Zulus appeared to have been unfairly treated in the matter of their award. It had been agreed that the lands, about which the dispute arose, should be restored to them; but it appeared that, in direct opposition to this, we had allowed the Boers to remain in occupation of them.

MR. MACDONALD quite agreed with the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), who had objected altogether to this Vote. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay) had stated that they were much indebted to Sir Bartle Frere for his services in South Africa; but in his (Mr. Macdonald's) opinion, they were only indebted to him for having incurred an expenditure which required this Vote of Credit to meet it. He considered that if Sir Bartle Frere had not been there, they should not now be embroiled in this war. He felt bound to enter his protest against it, and regretted exceedingly that the hon. Member for Meath did not press for a division in the matter. If he might be allowed to make the remark, in reply to the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), who had said that the Government should follow the example of America in the matter of public lands in South Africa, he should say that it would be a baneful day for England when she decided to enter upon such a course. How did they find it in that country? The poor had 160 acres each out West, if they chose to go and select the same and pay taxes upon it. The great Railroad Corporations of the United States had gone to the Legislature and got over 200,000,000 of acres by a system of jobbery unequalled in any country on the face of the earth. He hoped that, whatever might be done in the matter of public lands in Africa when acquired, at least one example would be avoided, and that was that of the United States. The disposal of those lands had been a greater scandal than any other public matter in that country.

MR. WHITWELL said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed not quite to understand the Question which he had put to him. His Question was as to the amount of money in successive years which had been voted for war in Africa.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER intimated that he had not understood the hon. Member's Question in that way.

MR. WHITWELL entirely agreed with the words that had fallen from the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn); but still it seemed to him that hon. Members must decide for themselves whether this was or was not an unavoidable war. It was certain that during the last few years too much assistance had been rendered to Colonists by Her Majesty's Government. He held that the war was entirely unnecessary, as the Colonies in South Africa ought to defend themselves. He could not understand how the Votes that had been given had been spent or accounted for. In 1876-7, £170,000 was voted by this House for South Africa; in 1877-8, £208,000; in 1878-9, £428,000—of course, that was connected with the affair in the Transvaal. Now, in 1879-80, a Vote was required for £642,000; so that it had gradually increased during the last few years from an almost nominal sum to the present amount of more than £500,000, to conduct a war in a Colony in which it was an acknowledged fact that a war was more expensive than in any other. They had derived no benefit from these wars. They had increased their territory, and that was all. They had little interest in things as they were; but now they hoped to improve the condition of the Natives, not by example of self-government, but by enjoining upon the neighbouring States the necessity of leaving the Natives out in their policy of annexation and aggrandizement, and by those means they hoped eventually to reach the centre of Africa. And, above all, the Government had been asked to commence the system of carrying the legions of India to protect their territories and extend their annexations over every barbarian tribe. He had listened with great attention to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell); but he failed to hear him say that he hoped this war would prove of benefit to the Natives. He trusted that the matter would be ventilated thoroughly, and that before long they would be able to enter upon a minute discussion with reference to it, and that they would be supplied by Government with Returns of men and money that had been sent to Africa during the last 10 years. He feared, however, that they would find that they had received nothing in return.

MR. CHILDERS said, that beyond question the Vote would be accepted by the House, although, no doubt, on a future occasion, the policy of the war would have to be fully discussed. It would be some time before they would be in possession of sufficiently full information to be able to discuss that question thoroughly in all its bearings. But he rose to call attention particularly to a question which occurred to him when the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer made his Statement before they went into Committee, and which was to be reserved until the discussion on the Vote. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that last Session a sum of £340,000 was voted for operations in South Africa, £40,000 of which would be required for the Navy. But, in addition to this £340,000, £400,000 had been previously spent—in fact, to a great extent, in the financial year 1877-8; and this the Chancellor of the Exchequer only knew by the drafts maturing on the Treasury Chest. The Chancellor of the Exchequer last August warned them that probably it would be found necessary to take a Vote to place this matter in a right position. He (Mr. Childers) wished to point out that thus a very large expenditure had been going on without any Supplementary Estimate, although subsequent expenditure of the same character had been the subject of an Estimate voted six months ago. He thought that no one would deny that such a financial arrangement was very unsatisfactory. He did not wish to blame the Government; but he thought that it was a bad precedent to take Votes in such a manner. What, however, he asked especially was this —as the £1,500,000 which they were now asked to vote was for the expenditure of the Zulu War, or South African transactions, beginning last October—was it expected that this sum would cover the entire expenditure up to 31st March, which had been incurred either in this country or in South Africa? In other words, whether the amount covered the total expenditure to 31st March; or only those drafts which had up to this time been presented against the Treasury Chest?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had some real difficulty in answering the question. He thought it would be understood, with reference to last year, that, in the first place, the Government had had no information beforehand for the year ending 31st March, 1878. But inasmuch as an extraordinary expenditure had been going on, it was certain that, sooner or later, an amount would be required to adjust the account of the Treasury Chest from which sums had been drawn. But that amount could only be ascertained when the Government were in possession of full information. At the time he was speaking—at the beginning of August—it was thought that the amount required would be the £300,000 for the expenditure of the Army, and £40,000 for the Navy, and the Government anticipated a further charge for the year 1878-9. A saving had been effected on the several Votes in the Estimate; but what had been expended over the amount saved would require to be voted. He was unable to say what was the amount of actual expenditure; but the War Office had given the Government an approximate account of what had been spent since October, and they estimated the amount to 31st March at £1,000,000. The Admiralty, however, who were able to calculate with greater precision than the War Office authorities, had named £200,000 as the amount they would require. The Government had considered that another £300,000 would be sufficient—probably more than sufficient—to cover contingencies, and on that account they had now asked for a Vote of £1,500,000 to cover all outlay to 31st March next.

MR. CHILDERS asked whether the Government had taken any steps to ascertain the actual expenditure going on in South Africa?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied, that a financial officer had been sent out to take charge of the matter.

MR. SULLIVAN: Sir, we find ourselves once again sitting in Committee of the Whole House to vote a war subsidy. I grievously fear that so long as the present occupants of the Treasury Bench retain their places they are determined the Temple of Janus shall not be closed. In the Reading Room of this House, a couple of years ago, Her Majesty's Ministers were kind enough to send up, for the convenience of the Members of the House of Commons, and to hang on the walls, maps of our latest acquisitions and our seats of war. We had maps of Cyprus and the harbours of Famagousta and Limasol, and all the rest of it. Then came the seat of war in Afghanistan, which covered all that remained of the wall; and the other day, when the clerks of the Intelligence Department came to fix up our newest seat of war, it was discovered that we had on hand so many seats of war, that there was no room for any more maps on the wall. Sir, if this sort of thing is to go on, where is it to end? I will tell you, at any rate, that it will not end so long as Her Majesty's Government can have money voted in this House on the excuse that, because we are involved in war, money must be voted to carry it on. It is always too late, or too soon to protest. For my part, I do emphatically protest against what seems to have become a system of plunging us into wars from which our consciences revolt, and then, because the butcher's bill is incurred, we are told that Government must needs have money, that it would be unpatriotic to refuse it. I object to being placed in any such predicament by the conduct of the Government. I know there are hon. Members round about me who will say—"We are as much opposed to this Zulu War as any man can be. We believe it to be an unjust war; but will vote for the money because the country is now engaged in the struggle." I can quite recognize that that is a ground which conscientious men of this House may take up; far be it from me to quarrel with them; but, for my part, I say my conscience recoils from having act, hand, or part in voting a sixpence for a war which I challenge any man in or out of this House to defend on the principles of public equity, if he will only suppose that it is Russia that is waging the war, and not England. I say that no man in this House will dare to apply to such a war the principles which you apply towards elsewhere. If this dusky savage, spear in hand, set forth to defend his home against the Frank, the Russian, or the German, English pens would trace his record of glory, and English poets would sing his fame. We have been reminded of the days of Pizarro, when men, savages perhaps, withstood the civilizing tyrant that came upon their shores. And when we stand in Pizarro's place in South Africa to-day, is no voice to be raised in England better worthy of being heard than mine to say—"I believe this to be an iniquitous and a wicked war. It is one in which I cannot sympathize. It is against all my convictions of right and wrong?" And at what an hour do we find ourselves so far gone in this onward march of aggression—this lust of territory, this greed of annexation? It is at the very moment that you have been contesting the right of a Christian Power to redress Christian wrongs in the East of Europe. You call Russia an aggressive Power, and treat us to homilies on the iniquity of her pushing her frontiers forward. Was ever hypocrisy so gigantic as yours? To call Russia aggressive, when you are reaching out your hands to grasp more territory in every region of the globe by every violation of right. You annex the Transvaal, and it is incontestable that you led this man to believe that you favoured his claims to this strip of land. The British authorities induced him to believe that they would recognize his claim; but no sooner had you annexed the Transvaal, than you turn round upon him in conduct which he calls—and I say justly calls—something very like perfidy. Now, that you are the Rulers of the Transvaal, you say he shall not have what you led him to expect. I wonder where slumbers the public morality of England? I look in vain in the public Press of this country for that voice which ought to speak out, when we read the Ultimatum—that impudent and insolent missive of Sir Bartle Frere. I know of nothing more audacious than the document which was sent to provoke this war; and now the land is agitated from end to end by the story of the terrible disaster in Zulu, and money is being sought here—not for defence of our South African Possessions, but in order to wage a war of vengeance on Cetewayo, and carry sword and flame into his territory. I pay my tribute—and it is all the more honest because it comes from me—to the gallantry and heroism of those soldiers who fell in support of their colours. They served their Queen and their colours well; but while I admire them, I more admire the men, savages though they be, who fell, with their feet on their native soil, defending themselves against invaders. My morality is not cribbed, cabined, and confined by geographical lines. I mete out to the savage the same measure of justice which I do to the more civilized races. Although a man is a savage, we ought not to deny him the degree of praise which is due to his patriotism, as praise was paid to Caractacus and Kosciusko. This Prince stood within his own territories, and he only did what Queen Elizabeth did in the case of the Spanish Armada, when it threatened English soil. He called his forces around him, as she did hers, and said—"I will make the invader bite the dust," and he did so. England, with the £1,500,000 you vote to-night, will doubtless succeed in a war of revenge upon this wretched Zulu Prince. £1,500,000! Why, if the Government had asked for £5,000,000, they would have got it. For my part, if I saw Cetewayo pushing his advantage so far as to invade the territories which do not belong to him, and to endanger the safety of peaceful settlers who are outside his own land, I could sympathize with your military movements; but in so far as he stands in the position of one who is resisting invasion, and is on his own soil, defending his own people and country, for my part I cannot avoid confessing—whatever consequences may follow from my avowing it—that I feel for the savage man, and say he ought to have from us the same admiration that the writers of history have taught us to pay to the men who resisted the Spanish invaders in Central America. I prize very highly the advantages of civilization, and the blessings of civil and religious liberty; but never shall a vote of mine be given to encourage unjust invasion and conquest on the pretext of pushing civilization, or to carry the Bible with the sword, so that rapacity may call its crimes the diffusion of Christianity. No, Sir; I will give no vote to extend this already swollen Empire at the cost of the liberty of these Natives, howsoever dark their skins may be. I protest here to-night against further annexation. I believe if the Representatives of Ireland, or the people of Ireland, had a voice in this question, they would say that the British Empire is wide enough, great enough, grand enough, powerful enough, and rich enough, without sending an Ultimatum to take a rood of ground from Cetewayo. We might leave this dusky savage to himself, and the British ensign would float as proudly from the turrets of Windsor Castle as it does now. Nay; much better and happier might we all be by giving up these aggressive enterprises and costly schemes of aggrandizement. While trade is languishing, and industries are perishing in our midst, and the cry of absolute destitution comes to us from the Midland Counties, £1,500,000 is being asked for from us in order to carry out this most iniquitous war. But all vainly I speak. To-night this money will be voted. I know that well; but I know what verdict will yet be passed on this episode of British history. When the present feeling of resentment has passed away—when passion has cooled, and reason returned—there will arise some Alison, or some Macaulay, or some Lecky, to trace this chapter. They will say it was a reproach to the British Parliament that it had not patriotism enough, or independence enough, to resist this application for money to spend in a war which is as unjust, as wicked, and as wanton, as that which George III. waged—thank God, he waged in vain!—against the liberty-loving people of the American Colonies.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN said, he had listened with a great deal of sympathy to the eloquent words which had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan). He (Mr. Chamberlain) had studied the Papers which had been presented to the House with reference to the unfortunate war in which they found themselves engaged, and he must say that, as far as those Papers went—as far as the information went which had at present been afforded to Members of the House—he believed that nothing had been produced which justified the war. It appeared to be a war as iniquitous and as unjust as any with which this country had ever been engaged. He, however, felt they were bound, in fairness to the Government, and still more in fairness to those persons in authority who were incriminated in the proceedings, to wait until they had all the information which their friends considered necessary to their defence. They had been assured by the Government that there remained to be produced Papers of the greatest importance; and if he had rightly understood the answer of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Colonies, the Papers which were to be published on Monday would contain all that the Government considered to be essential to the proper consideration of the causes of the war. [Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I did not say so.] He had understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that there would be further Papers which would have reference to the disaster at Isandula; but that as regarded the causes of the war they should have Papers on Monday that would enable them to come to a right conclusion.

Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: So far as I have them, the hon. Member will have all such Papers by Monday; but there may be other despatches on the way that may be of great importance.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN said, all he wished to urge was this—That until the Government could tell them that they were in possession of all essential documents, it was undesirable to discuss this matter in detail; but as soon as they were in possession of those documents, unless the further documents which were to be produced threw an entirely new light upon the subject, he should be prepared to condemn, as absolutely and as entirely as did his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Louth, the proceedings which, unfortunately, had led the country into war. In his comprehension that was the view of the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke), who had put a Resolution upon the Paper, which, as he understood, the hon. Baronet was determined to discuss as soon as the full information was before them. Under these circumstances, there only remained the question as to what was to be done with reference to the Vote they were asked to pass that night. It appeared to him that it was one of the misfortunes of all inequitable proceedings, by whomsoever initiated, that while it was very easy to drag this country into war, or to allow it to drift into war, it was not easy to stand still after the mischief had been done. At the present time the result of the action in South Africa had been to place in danger a large number of British subjects, and possibly also the British troops who had been sent over to their assistance; and he did not see how, while holding the Government to their common responsibility in this matter, they could refuse them the resources which they believed to be necessary, not, as he understood, to prosecute a war of revenge, but in order to secure life and property in the Colony which was menaced. Under those circumstances he was prepared to support the Vote, while he reserved absolutely his opinion as to the causes of the war for discussion at another period. Now he was on the subject, he should like to ask a Question of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. When the right hon. Gentleman first introduced the Vote in the House, he understood him to say that the previous war in which they were engaged—the war in Transkei—had finished in July, 1878. He should like to know whether he correctly understood the right hon. Gentleman, and in what sense he meant to represent the war in Transkei as having been entirely concluded? As far as he (Mr. Chamberlain) could judge from the Papers presented to Parliament, he thought that war was only standing over until they had had time to deal with Cetewayo; and at the present moment he understood that one of the dangers with which the Colonies in South Africa were menaced was the possibility that Secoceni might take advantage of our being engaged with Cetewayo and might invade the Transvaal territory. There appeared no certainty whatever that they might not have two wars on their hands at the same time; and he did not understand the confidence with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer told them that the £400,000 which they voted last Session would be sufficient to pay the whole expenses of the war, which, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, had been concluded.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, the war in the Transkei was concluded last July. That district was on the borders of Cape Colony, many hundreds of miles from the points at which their troops were now engaged, and still further from Secoceni's country. It was perfectly true that the war with Secoceni might, in a certain sense, be said to stand over; but as he believed this Chief to be but a vassal of Cetewayo's, it might be reasonably hoped that when the Zulu War was concluded little more would be heard of him.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL understood that the £1,500,000, if voted at all, was voted for ever; and that it was not a Vote of Credit, detailed Estimates for which would be afterwards furnished. There appeared to be a great discrepancy between the charge for Naval transport and the Military charges; for while the sum of £200,000 only was asked for the former, the latter amounted to the enormous sum of £1,300,000. As the 8,000 or 9,000 men now being sent to the Cape could not arrive till the end of March, it was clear that hardly a farthing of military expense could be incurred on their account; and it appeared that by far the greater part of the £1,300,000 must have been expended in South Africa upon the small force now there. He must express a hope that the Head of the Department concerned would afford some idea of the mode in which the sum in question had been applied.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he had received no reply to his inquiry about the stores provided last year. He wished to know why the large amount of stores, prepared last year for a war which did not take place, were not now available for the war in which they were engaged? He must beg to have a reply from some Member of the Government.

COLONEL STANLEY said, with regard to the Question of the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon), as to the amount for warlike stores voted last year, he must ask the Committee to consider the very difficult services their Army had to perform, and the stations which were in question when the Vote was granted. He was speaking without figures and from recollection; but the Committee was, perhaps, aware that undoubtedly a very large amount had been spent for warlike stores—torpedoes, heavy guns, field guns, and stores of that kind. Their present requirements, it must be borne in mind, were of a very special character. For instance, they had sent out guns of the very lightest class that could be manufactured; not 9 or 10-pounders, but guns mounted on special carriages. There were other matters connected with the transport which would also be of very special requirements. He would further remind the Committee that the troops were at great distances from each other in a very difficult country. Again, there were certain questions on which the Government had thought it wise to send out a financial officer to settle accounts, and endeavour to get an audit on the spot, which, although rough-and-ready, would be the best obtainable. Many of the advances which had been made, so far as his opinion went, came out of the Military Chest. His right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had promised that a careful account should be rendered to Parliament; and he (Colonel Stanley) could say that he desired nothing more earnestly than that every information should be laid before the Committee concerning the items in question at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, he thought that, as the sum of £1,500,000 was going to be voted, some view should be taken of the position in which they stood. For the second time they had been brought into war, and asked to vote money for that war, while they were told, if any question was raised as regarded the propriety of voting the money, that their course was unpatriotic, and against the interests of the Colony and country, which were at stake. Such an answer was very unsatisfactory to the people, and was utterly inconsistent with, and opposed to, the Constitution of this country, no matter what might be found in black-letter books on the subject. That they should be hurried into war, and have no discretion left to them but to pay when asked, was a condition of things which could not last very long. Somebody must be fixed with the blame of the Zulu War. The organs of the Government among the Press had been saying for some time that Sir Bartle Frere was the cause of the war. If that was the case, he had committed a great crime, and it should not go unpunished. If the Government made out a case, and threw it upon his shoulders, he must bear the charge; if they did not try to prevent the war, the country would revenge itself upon the Government; but if, on the other hand, Sir Bartle Frere had been made the scapegoat, justly or unjustly, the matter would not be allowed to pass. He would, if nobody else did, place a Notice of impeachment of the Government on the Paper.

Mr. BIGGAR said, it had been stated that the Government were not to blame for this war. Then, if that was the case, and if Sir Bartle Frere was the cause of it, why did they not recall him? It was as clear as noon-day that either the Government at the Cape or at home were to blame for the war. It appeared to him that the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Holland) was on the horns of a dilemma. He had also raised another point—namely, that arbitration was held, the result of which was in favour of the Zulu King. They decided, it would appear, that the King was perfectly in the right, but that the other party should keep the property. With regard to the mode of carrying on the war, they had recent experience of English warfare in Afghanistan, where the English troops massacred in cold blood a number of prisoners bound and unarmed. That was not, in his opinion, in accordance with the rules of civilized warfare; and he feared they might have further instances of this system in the present war.

Mr. W. H. JAMES inquired whether it would not be possible to have the casualties among the rank and file telegraphed in future, in the case of disaster, as well as of the officers?

Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, that as long ago as last summer he had addressed a despatch to the Governors of the South African Colonies, requesting full information in the case of any casualties, and a fortnight ago he had repeated that request to Sir Bartle Frere. He would add one word with regard to what had passed that evening. He had listened to the speeches of several hon. Members, most of whom had said that they would not discuss the policy and causes of the war, and had then entered into an expression of opinion upon one or more points of the subject. There were, no doubt, great differences of opinion thereon; but it seemed to him that the right view had been expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), when he said that the present was not the time for discussion upon the causes of the war. He would, therefore, only say that he wished to enter his protest against such language as had been made use of by the hon. and learned Member for Louth, who had applied the words "wicked" and "audacious" to the Ultimatum sent to Cetewayo by Sir Bartle Frere. On behalf of Sir Bartle Frere, he must ask even those who were most disposed to blame him, at any rate to hear what he had to say for himself before they condemned him.

MR. CALLAN said, that if the war was wicked and impious, as he believed it to be, they ought to divide upon it. No Party combination ought to prevent them from expressing their opinion on the money Vote. What would be the use of expressing an opinion on the policy of a war after the money was voted?

MOTION.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, in rising to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Law relating to the Discipline and Regulation of the Army, I cannot but feel conscious of the difficulty of the task before me, and I cannot but wish that my noble Friend and Predecessor (Viscount Cranbrook), who, in the first instance, had this subject brought under his consideration, were here at this moment, by his clear diction and his strong common sense, to make this somewhat complicated matter clear to the House. I do not propose, at this time of the night, to go back into various questions which might otherwise be of considerable interest, nor to trace from remote ages the manner in which the military law of the country grew up; but there are one or two points to which I must advert to show that even from the earliest times it was found necessary that a short, summary, and stringent law should be applied to such forces as were kept under arms. In early days, of course, the proceedings of martial law were of considerable stringency, but were, at the same time, very well defined. Dating from the earlier days of the courts of chivalry—from almost feudal times—we trace them in the form of the Court of the High Constable and of the Earl Marshal, and in that form passing from the jurisdiction of the Earl Marshal—almost a military office—they continue down to the middle of the 16th century. Then came the time when the absolute government of the Army was over, and the Army was almost entirely administered by Articles of War, framed under the Prerogative of the Crown. When the Court of the High Constable and the Earl Marshal had been extinguished, there was still a necessity for a tribunal to deal with military offences; and in 1625 a Commission was issued to certain military officers and civilians authorizing them to punish military offenders, and he was sorry to say "other dissolute offenders," by martial law. Articles of War were issued for their guidance. Three or more persons constituted a Court, and their sentences required the sanction of the Crown before they could be carried out. These Articles contain an outline of the present system, without the present statutory authority. The first part deals with the martial law; the second with the Articles of War, growing out of it, as they now do out of the Mutiny Act; the third with the court martial to try and sentence offenders; and the fourth with the general confirmation of the sentence before execution. The same necessity for this Court seems to have existed under the Commonwealth as under Royal authority; and in 1642 the then Lord General seems to have found himself under the necessity of strengthening his hands by obtaining summary powers to deal with military offences; and he obtained them, for on the 6th of September, 1642, it is recommended that and apparently on the very same day the laws and ordinances for the better government of the Army were on his authority framed and confirmed. From time to time military orders and articles for the government of guards and garrisons were issued, and in some cases special commissions were given to Commanders-in-Chief for the framing of Articles of War. Under that system the Army appears to have been administered until we come to something approaching the Mutiny Act in 1689. That was directly traceable to the following incident:—Several regiments which had enlisted under James II. were ordered by William III. to embark for Holland. Eight hundred of the men mutinied, and declared James to be their King, and that they would live and die by him. On the 13th of March leave was given to introduce the Mutiny Bill, and on the 15th the Government, desiring to suppress the soldiers now in rebellion, issued a Proclamation declaring them, and all that adhered to them, rebels and traitors. That Bill passed through all its stages by the 28th, and I hope the Bill I now ask leave to introduce may pass as quickly. It received the Royal Assent five days after, and it came into operation on the 12th of April following. That Bill was contained in 10 sections. The 1st section enabled the Government to punish any officer or soldier

“Inciting, causing, or joining in mutiny, or deserting the Army, with death or such punishment as by court martial shall be inflicted.”

Other sections declared the number and rank of the officers who were to constitute the court martial; section 8 limited the Act and prescribed the form of the proceedings; while the 10th further prescribed that all capital cases should only be tried between certain hours of the day. That Act made no provision for the discipline or government of the Army in minor matters, and made no mention of the Articles of War. Apparently, therefore, the Parliament, by the Mutiny Act, while it strengthened the authority of William III. over the Army by enabling him to punish certain quasi-political offences, left the Army in every other respect to be governed by the Prerogative clauses. Further proof of it is shown by the fact that a court martial was held at Exeter in 1696, when certain men were found guilty under the 23rd Article and sentenced to be shot to death. No such section appears in the Mutiny Act. From that time to the present, although there have been important and considerable changes both in the Mutiny Act and in the Articles of War, the same general line has still been followed. There have been Mutiny Acts passed by Parliament, and Articles of War expressed the Prerogative of the Crown, although in later years statutory power is given to these Articles by a Statute passed by this House. But, passing to the more immediate business, I now come to the circumstances under which it is my duty to lay this Bill on the Table of the House. In 1869—whether following or in consequence of the Courts Martial Commission I am not at this moment prepared to say—instructions were given to the Parliamentary Counsel to prepare a Bill to consolidate the law relating to the Army. It was clear that such a step was necessary, for the Courts Martial Commission commented very strongly in their Report on the necessity of drafting the military law in a clearer form. Instructions were accordingly given to Parliamentary Counsel—I believe in the year 1871 an Army Discipline Bill was handed over to Mr. Davidson, the then Judge Advocate General. His untimely death—a death which, I am sure, those Members who were acquainted with him must deeply regret, for he was a person of great judicial power and of large views—was a loss to Parliament at that time, for it put a stop to any further proceedings in relation to the Bill. The subject was again taken up, I believe, by Parliamentary Counsel under instructions from Lord Cardwell in the Autumn of 1872. A War Office Committee, consisting of officers high in the Service, went through a large portion of the Army Discipline Bill in March, 1873, and suggested certain alterations, which, I believe, were introduced at that period by Counsel. Another pause ensued; some of the questions raised by the then recent organization were not settled, and the Secretary of State for War thought it best to postpone the Bill for another Session. During the Vacation of 1873, Mr. Ayrton was appointed Judge Advocate General, and on the 13th of November he took up the subject, and undertook to conduct the Bill through Parliament. He suggested that the Bill should be altogether assimilated to the Mutiny Act, and that the clauses relating to billeting, moving of troops, and enlistment should, so far as they are included in the Mutiny Act, be inserted in the Army Discipline Bill. Bills were prepared, were submitted to Mr. Ayrton, and he introduced into the Bill, then called the Army Discipline Bill, so much of them as was necessary for the consolidation of the Mutiny Act; but he omitted the enactments of the Army Enlistment Act, 1870, and two other enactments, which had previously found a place in the Mutiny Act. The change which took place at this time in the composition of the House caused us the disadvantage of losing from our discussions on this point the services of Mr. Ayrton; but with a public spirit and good feeling, which is an example to many of us, although both out of office and out of Parliament, he did not relax from his labours until he had thoroughly completed his revision of the Bill and forwarded it to the Parliamentary Counsel, who afterwards reprinted it in the form as he settled it. We then found ourselves in this position. From the time of the Courts Martial Commission—a period of nearly 10 years—the military law had been so far condemned that, although we were anxious to adhere to its provisions, all felt it was in a confused state, and must reasonably be re-drawn. Pressing business before the House prevented the introduction of the Bill by successive Secretaries of State; but it was always felt—and I think that those who were most intimate with the subject have felt it strongest—that, like the dancing bear, of which it was said that the wonder was not that he danced so well, but that he danced at all, the wonder was not that the officers of the Army administered the law as they found it in the Mutiny Act with so little complaint, but that they were able to administer it at all. When, therefore, attention was called to it in the House, it was felt that many of the sections could not be theoretically or practically defended. My right hon. Friend, now Viscount Cranbrook, gave a pledge to the House that at the earliest possible moment he would have the Bill re-drafted; and he expressed his confidence that 1877 would be the last year in which the present form of the Mutiny Act would be submitted to the House. Owing to the force of circumstances, it was found impossible to proceed with the re-drafting of the Bill in 1877. In 1878 the natural desire of the House for the assimilation of the law was more definitely expressed, and a definite statement was made by Viscount Cranbrook during the course of the debate, that he would at once place a Bill before a Parliamentary Committee to be appointed from Members of this House. Then, Sir, came a change in the personnel of the War Office, and when I succeeded to my present position I found myself with a Bill which had been making considerable progress, but was, in many respects, far from complete. Notwithstanding the extraordinary efforts of the able Parliamentary Counsel, it was found impossible to lay the Bill before the Committee in a complete form. Indeed, at one time suggestions were made that the Committee should be asked to postpone their sittings; but I felt that a pledge, especially given under such circumstances, should be redeemed at any hazard, and, therefore, I laid the draft before the Committee, without professing that it was a complete measure. They reported upon it; and I am bound to say that their Report seemed to me as favourable, on the whole, as it could possibly be, under the circumstances in which it was presented to them. If I may venture to do so, I should wish to bear my humble testimony and extend my sincere thanks and those of the Government to my hon. and learned Relative opposite (Sir William Harcourt) for the pains and care with which he piloted this Bill through the deliberations of the Committee. In acknowledging his kindness, I am happy to state that, as far as possible, the Bill which I now ask leave to introduce follows the general lines of the Bill laid before the Committee. The Bill was to consolidate and amend the Mutiny Act and the Articles of War; and though I am afraid it looks rather bulky and formidable, I hope hon. Members will not think it unduly so, when they remember that the Mutiny Act contained 110 clauses, the Articles of War 192; and, further, that we have endeavoured, in certain matters, to bring within the scope of the Bill portions of the Enlistment Act. Heavy as the task has been in some respects, it has not been our wish that the Bill should be too much changed in character. A great many alterations take place; but they are mostly in form and construction, although there are some extremely important changes in principle made here and there, upon which I will very briefly touch. It is divided into five parts:—Enlistment, billeting, empressment of carriages, certain miscellaneous provisions, and the application of the Act, together with certain saving clauses and definitions. The first part, again, is sub-divided under the heads—crimes and punishments, courts martial, and execution of sentences. As to the first part—crimes and punishments—we have retained the old language where it is clear, believing it is more easily read and interpreted, its very familiarity to the soldier being a point of some importance. We have, however, taken a distinct departure in one respect, and we now classify offences by grouping together offences of a similar character, ranging the various groups, as between themselves, in a manner which is intended to impress the soldier with their relative importance. Thus we have—first, misbehaviour in the field—the greatest crime a soldier can commit—by sentinel on duty; mutiny and insubordination, by way of showing that, after misconduct in the field, mutiny ranks next; then desertion, absence without leave, disgraceful conduct, drunkenness, and other offences, which I will not detain the House by specifying. With regard to crimes and punishments, these appear to me the chief differences in principle. We have differentiated between offences on active service and those not on active service, active service being, by the way, defined as meaning service in war or when in occupation of an enemy's country. We have farther defined, or attempted to define, desertion, which has been so far extended as to include merely abandoning one regiment for another. We have now endeavoured to restrict it to quitting or deserting the Service. We have found it necessary to set up again, as in one of the earliest Mutiny Acts, the crime of fraudulent enlistment as such, not treating it as desertion, but as a fraudulent breach of an engagement, with a view to a fraudulent contract. The Bill then proceeds to declare a scale of punishments, and in this we follow the precedent of the Naval Discipline Act, making a considerable deviation from the existing practice. At present punishments are constantly designated as "such punishments as a general or other court martial may award." The Bill defines the maximum punishment, and then, under the head "Scale of punishments," provision is made that a court martial may award that or a less punishment. Passing next to courts martial, we have re-arranged the old law, but we have maintained the principle. Now, courts martial will be divided into two classes in respect of the mode in which they are convened. First of all, courts martial are now convened under the authority of the Statute alone; and, secondly, under authority, derived mediately or immediately by Warrant from the Crown. The first class, under Act of Parliament, are regimental courts martial and detachment courts martial; secondly, general courts martial and district courts martial. I should add to these a fifth sort, detachment general courts martial—which can be convened without Warrant—having the powers of a general court martial, but only under special circumstances, for the protection of the life and property of the inhabitants of a country in which the troops are acting. The law will remain unaltered for regimental or detachment courts martial, which will still be convened by Statute; but we do not see the advantage of keeping up the separate name for detachment general courts martial, and we propose to merge it, with its functions, into regimental courts martial, keeping the extraordinary powers merely under the same circumstances which under the former Act rendered extraordinary powers necessary. General courts martial will remain unaltered, the convening authority being, as hitherto, either a Warrant directly from the Queen, or from a person authorized by order from Her. The district court martial has been altered as to the mode in which it is convened. The authority to convene a general court martial we now intend to carry with it, first, the authority to convene a district court martial; and, secondly, to delegate to another officer the power to convene a district court martial. The matter is a little complicated; but the result stands in this way. Practically, every court martial, except a general court martial, will derive authority from the Statute, although in the case of district courts martial the authority will be exercised by a person who has a derivative authority under Warrant of the Crown. There is some difficulty in explaining who are the confirming authorities; but, practically, we have thought it best to allow the law to remain the same under the Bill as it is at present. We have endeavoured, however, to clear up the language, and to make it perfectly intelligible as to who is the confirming authority under the various circumstances in which he has to exercise these functions. The confirming authority for a general court martial is appointed by Warrant; and in case of a district court martial, confirming power is given to the officer having power to convene the court martial. Before we come to the matter of procedure, there is one matter which does not come under courts martial, but so nearly trenches on their functions that I think it better to allude to it here, and point out the reasons which, so long ago as 1869, were urged in favour of the change. The Courts Martial Commission, in their Report, say—

"It is a question whether the frequency of regimental courts martial does not tend to diminish, in the mind of the soldier, that dread of them which ought to exist if they are to have their proper weight as preventives of indiscipline and crime, and it is submitted for our consideration whether the powers of commanding officers might not be advantageously increased, so as to lessen the number of trials. Some of the evidence was in favour of abolishing regimental courts altogether. We are not prepared to recommend the latter course; but we concur in the view that the jurisdiction of the commanding officer may be safely extended, and we recommend that his power of imprisonment be extended from seven to twenty-one days."

After very careful consideration, we have found it advisable to extend to commanding officers this further power of sentence, recommended by the Commission of 1869, and we have also given the commanding officer the power, as urged upon the House by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan), that, in the case of a non-commissioned officer, there should be some power given to the commanding officer to deal with offences in a less summary and strict way. At the present time, if a non-commissioned officer comes before the commanding officer charged with any crime there is practically no middle course between sending that officer before a court martial or letting him off, without punishment, altogether, or with merely a reprimand. Under the altered circumstances of the Army, and under the very strong wish we have to obtain good non-commissioned officers, and, when we have got them, to encourage them to remain in the performance of their very arduous duties, we have thought it right to give the commanding officer the power to reduce a non-commissioned officer, by one or more grades, as he shall think fit. I am quite aware there is much to be urged on both sides. Many eminent military authorities hold to the view that a non-commissioned officer who once commits himself has so lost caste that he would never be able to assume a position of authority, and that his reduction to the ranks must ensue. Practically, I am bound to say that the effect of that is that—I do not say in many cases, but not infrequently—a non-commissioned officer obliged to be reduced is, within a very few days, after re-instated. It might not be wise to punish a non-commissioned officer, not altogether, perhaps, for some fault of his own, by putting him down in all cases to the bottom of the list; and, therefore, we have given the commanding officer power to reduce a man one or more grades. But while we give this power to the commanding officer, with a view to diminishing the frequency of regimental courts martial, and so of giving them their proper weight in the maintenance of discipline, we have also given in these two cases the power of appealing from the sentence of the commanding officer to the court. We have not thought it right that the power of forfeiting pay, liberty, or rank should be left, without appeal, in the hands of any one person, however good that person may be. Passing on to the procedure, the first thing I have to mention is, that we have effected an alteration in the form of oath taken by members of a court martial. The Commission pointed out that the present form was very vague and unsatisfactory, and recommended that the oath should be that now used under the Naval Discipline Act. That is a very simple form, and it amounts to this—that the officers are sworn to try and determine the charge under the provisions of the Act of Parliament. Another important alteration suggested by the Courts Martial Commission we have thought it advisable to carry out—that where there is a verdict of acquittal on all the charges, that acquittal shall be pronounced in open court. At the present time, until the finding of a court martial is approved the prisoner, even although there may be a verdict of acquittal, is detained in custody, sometimes owing to inevitable circumstances, for a considerable period. We think that justice will be better done by the discharge of the prisoner at once, where the acquittal extends to all the charges. Of course, in cases where there is only a partial acquittal, the detention will still continue. We have also taken power to the courts—as in the Naval Discipline Act—to find a prisoner guilty of a less grave offence than that with which he is charged. For instance, a prisoner charged with stealing may be found guilty of embezzlement or fraudulent misapplication, according to the circumstances. With regard to penal servitude, we have, I am sorry to say, been obliged to recognize the absolute necessity which exists in the Army, as at present constituted, for some punishment more severe than mere imprisonment. Although the subject has received our very careful consideration, we have not found ourselves at liberty to remove from the Bill the punishment of penal servitude in certain cases. But we have laid down that it is only to be carried out in the same manner as sanctioned in the United Kingdom; and, in the majority of instances, that will really amount to penal servitude being carried out in this country. With regard to imprisonment, we have also taken into consideration that which, I venture to say, was, no doubt, I will not say an abuse, but a wrong use of a former system, and we have endeavoured to provide that punishment shall not be cumulative beyond a certain extent. I confess this is a subject on which I have, perhaps, more doubt than any other portion of the Bill. We know that soldiers are not always to be dealt with by kind treatment alone; and though I believe, in the majority of cases, that is the way to deal with them, yet there are a certain number of men who must be in fear of a sufficient punishment in order to keep them within proper and reasonable control. We thought it right to limit the period of imprisonment to the maximum of two years. We have also given power to the courts martial, who do not appear hitherto to have possessed it, in certain cases where offences have been committed from insanity to find a special verdict that the prisoner is insane, and he will then be ordered to be detained during Her Majesty's pleasure. I have now spoken of the chief measures of procedure, and I propose to pass to another subject of considerable importance—that of enlistment. The Bill, as now drawn, makes certain changes, slight though they may be in form, in the Reserve Act, and these I think it necessary to bring to the notice of the House. When the Reserve Act was brought in, there are those who will remember the discussion which took place, and how, rather as a matter of compromise than otherwise, the limitation of service was introduced in the Bill, and it was prescribed that a soldier should serve not less than so many years with the Colours previous to his subsequent service in the Reserve. We have now taken greater powers of elasticity in many ways. We have taken power to enlist men for a less period than 12 years, although not wholly for Army service; and we also take power to the Secretary of State to allow a man to enter the Reserve, though he had not served in the Army for three years. It was thought at that time that three years were necessary as a minimum, and that a man could not be trained as an efficient soldier in less. But it was altogether left out of sight that in these days, when men enlisted early, they must be passed through all their stages of service before they had reached years of decrepitude. There might be circumstances under which you may wish to bring back into the Army, to pass him into the Reserve, some man who has served with credit in the Army before. The cases were not infrequent during last spring, when men, thoroughly trained soldiers, would produce their discharge, and being still within the ages for enlistment, would offer themselves for service in the Army. We had to take them as soldiers without the power we should otherwise have exercised of passing them through the ranks and into the Reserve. That power we propose to take, and I hope it will be of advantage to the Service. We have also taken corresponding power with the view of clearing up a point as to which there was some doubt. At present there is some doubt whether a Reserve man can volunteer for service. We should be, on all occasions, anxious to employ a Reserve man, to have the Army assume its largest dimensions; and there are other occasions when, if men are anxious to come forward for actual service, there may be strong reasons for employing them. Even with the proceedings of last week in remembrance, there are many occasions on which we should be glad to have them back. What was intended was, no doubt, a good object—to keep the Reserve locked up for national emergency. But we hope that these great emergencies, which justify calling out the Reserves, will only occur occasionally; whereas there may be many occasions when strong drafts are wanted, and then it may be desirable to employ men who come forward with their own consent. We have thought it worth while sacrificing something of the Reserve in order to use these men. We make also an important change in the enlistment. It is a difficult subject for those who are not familiar with it; but I trust I shall make it clear, as far as I can. From time immemorial enlistment has been held to consist in the passage of a coin, usually a shilling, given by the recruiter to the recruit. Men, too, often were enlisted in a state when they were ignorant of what they had done; and having regard also to the circumstance that a man might engage for the greater portion of his lifetime to serve the Crown, the law thought it right to interpose a delay of not less than 24 hours, or more than 96, before the man could go before a magistrate and complete the forms which we recognize under the term attestation. He is asked certain questions as to his age, married or single, whether he has served before, and so on. He is bound, under penalty, to reply to these accurately, and he is then attested in the presence of the magistrate for the Service. But in these days, when recruits are pretty well awake to what they are doing, we do not see any reason why we should not alter this, do away with the enlistment shilling, and make the attestation before the magistrate the real enlistment. What will happen, therefore, will be this. The recruit engages himself to the recruiter to appear before the magistrate. When taken there he, presumably, must be in a fit state to enter into a contract, and then and there without further delay before the magistrate he will enter into a regular contract of service. This will have the advantage of preventing that disagreeable beginning of a soldier's service which is not really the fault of the men but the system. We say a man shall not be attested for 24 hours, but we do not give him the privileges of a soldier; we do not give him a billet, or any place in barracks; but we keep him hanging about, often in very discreditable localities, until the following morning, when he comes up before the magistrate. We think, on the whole, that it would be better to balance the thing fairly. We think that the recruit is wide awake enough to see that the attestation before the magistrate is what he is bound to. At present, if he wishes to be off his bargain between the time he receives the shilling and the attestation, he pays smart money of about £1. We intend to alter that. If a recruit, between the time when he first meets the recruiter and the time he is to present himself for attestation, chooses to disappear, that is a matter to be settled between him and the recruiter who enlisted him. The real contract will begin from the attestation, and from that time he will become, to all intents and purposes, a soldier, and subject to the privilege of being at once brought into barracks, and removed from the evil communications I have mentioned. Then, after attestation, a soldier can at present only obtain his discharge as an indulgence, and he pays, in most cases, a sum amounting to about £20. I think there is no injustice in giving a man the power to claim his discharge at any time within three months of his enlistment, not as a favour but of right, on repayment of what we fairly estimate the cost he has put the country, amounting to about £10. He will claim that not as an indulgence but as a right, and no doubt many men who have changed their minds and find the Service different to what they expected, and who can do better in civil life, will avail themselves of this right we propose to give them. Well, then, I come to another portion of the Bill which, simple though it may look, is of very great importance. We feel at this moment that there are many men in prison whose lives are passing away discreditably to themselves and uselessly to their country. If, by any means in our power, we can render these men useful soldiers, it is our duty to do so; and I, therefore, propose to ask for power to transfer men under sentence for certain crimes for general service. We shall not do it lightly, or where the punishment is such as a light sentence from courts martial; but we do feel that there are many cases of desertion, and other crimes, which have really arisen from young men being led away into bad company; and we think, in the present days of short service, there is little injustice in calling upon a man to fulfil part of his term in an engagement, not in this country but in some one of her Dependencies. Many men get into temptation in this country who, in many cases, I believe, will own themselves unable to keep out of it, who will, nevertheless, in the Colonies or in India turn out good soldiers. We have also taken power, under certain circumstances, to allow a man to be moved from his regiment as a prisoner. When regiments are sent abroad drafts have to be obtained, and some men, whether by carelessness or in some cases perhaps with intent, manage to get into trouble just before their draft or regiment leaves, and instead of going with it, and performing their duty, they have to be left behind in prison. We propose that, under certain circumstances, men may be removed as prisoners with their regiment, giving power to liberate them on the voyage, or subsequently, so enabling them to wipe away their disgrace and return to the colours. We think this is fair to the men all round. It throws the work upon those who would wish to shirk their duty, and relieves the good soldier from the duty otherwise unfairly thrust upon him. At present, a soldier forfeits his service for the time when he is passing under imprisonment, or detained for trial, or is a prisoner of war. Well, we propose to remove these forfeitures; but we provide that the soldier guilty of desertion or of fraudulent enlistment, or of becoming a prisoner of war without due cause, shall forfeit all prior service. It sounds severe; but desertion is so formidable that, feeling the responsibility of what I do, I am bound to ask the House to give us sufficient power to deal with it; but otherwise we do not intend to forfeit service for any kind of imprisonment, or for not performing duty. The fact is, curiously enough, under present circumstances, the man who is constantly losing service for being in prison is really very often approaching the end of his sentence almost in a retrograde manner. The soldier who has enlisted for six years, and has spent one in prison, has seven years, under present circumstances, to serve before he can get his discharge, or be removed from the Army. We think that is treating it in the wrong way, because it causes us to keep a bad man when we would rather replace him by a good one. We intend, then, that prison service shall no longer be barred, but shall run on exactly as if he were in the ranks. That enables us to prevent the ranks from becoming clogged with men we want to get rid of. I am happy to say, also, that the state of the recruiting market is such as to enable us to pick our men, and to get good men to replace the bad. We have made re-engagement a matter of indulgence. We find, practically, that very often re-engagement leads to loss, and we intend to allow it only as a matter of indulgence, and we do not intend to give it as a matter of right. With regard to old soldiers left at the dépôt when the regiment goes abroad, we propose to take power when a man is within two years of his time, or when he is unfit for foreign service, not merely to transfer him to the home battalion, but, if we think fit, to transfer him prematurely to the Reserve. With regard to the laws of billeting, we have not introduced any very considerable change; but we have assimilated the English and Irish laws, which formerly differed to a very great extent. I do not think it necessary to keep up in Ireland what does not exist in England; and I propose that billeting in private houses there shall be given up. In respect to taking carriages on an emergency, and when necessary for the public use, we have endeavoured to bring the law more into harmony with the times in which we live; but, at the same time, we do not feel ourselves altogether free to part with the power of billeting, or of taking carriages. We have also settled the mode in which the route is to be issued; and we have endeavoured to define the position of that person who has been alluded to in Acts of Parliament for 100 years, but has never before existed in real life—the billet master, or civil authority of billets. We now come to the application of the Act. There is one point upon which there has always been a difference of opinion, and it is a subject of considerable difficulty; but I have not thought it my duty to shrink from endeavouring to interpret the law in respect to it. There has always been a question whether half-pay officers were under the Act or not. The words of the Act are "commission or on pay." As they receive pay, no doubt they do come under the terms of the Act. It has always been held to be vague, and the application has never been carried into effect within recent times, although I am advised that it is applicable. But the House will bear in mind that there is a new class of half-pay officers growing up, or rather a class who are very much in the position of half-pay officers—namely, persons who, by their own choice, have chosen to retire with a pension, that pension carrying with it a liability to a call for service under certain limits of age. We do not think it right that an officer, who served yesterday and may serve to-morrow, should be able entirely to throw aside his military status. If he chooses the position at his free option, we think it not too much to ask that the man who wears the uniform of the country and receives its pay should be so far subject to military law that it can deal with him in cases of grave misconduct. It is a subject which must always be one of some doubt, and I approach it myself, I confess, with diffidence. But I feel strengthened in the view I take by feeling that there are many officers who are placed in a similar position, and to whom I will refer a little later on in connection with the Auxiliary Forces. We define generally the Regular Forces as officers and men who are continuously serving. It will be borne in mind that Viscount Cardwell's Act of 1871 place the Auxiliary Forces, of whatever nature, when training and exercising with the Militia or Regular Forces, under the Mutiny Act. We provide under this Bill, also, that whenever the Militia and the Volunteers are brigaded with the Regulars, that in relation to military law they shall be placed in precisely the same position. Viscount Cardwell's Act recognizes the Auxiliary Forces as coming in direct relation to the Army, as it was then understood. They form part of the general Land Forces, and, when together, should be brought under the same discipline. We think it right to be consistent, and we think where Forces are so much intermingled it is advisable to recognize the fact, and to place the Militia and the Volunteers upon precisely the same footing as officers and men of the Regular Army, when they are attached to them. A Volunteer, then, while serving with the Regular Forces—which is entirely at his own choice—shall become liable to this Act, exactly as if he were the soldier whose duty he is anxious to undertake. We propose, also, subject to due inquiry and satisfactory assurances that they will discharge their duty with ability and discretion, as we enable Regular officers to serve upon courts martial upon Volunteers and Militia, to enable, at the discretion of the general officer, Militia and Volunteer officers to be members of courts martial for the trial of officers and men of the Regular Service. It is difficult to define, and many people will doubt the wisdom of this course; but it is accepted by the highest military authority, and those who are most conversant with the discipline of the Army have not hesitated to give to this principle an unqualified adhesion. My noble Friend associated with me at the War Office, and my hon. and gallant Friend the Financial Secretary, state that, so far as they can ascertain, the Volunteer Forces are quite as willing as the Militia were to see themselves placed on this footing of liability, and that they would accept the liability and the position offered to them in connection with the Regular Forces. The Regular Forces are those officers and soldiers who are on continuous military service; the Reserve Forces are the Forces raisable under the Army and Militia Reserve Acts; the Auxiliary Forces are the Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteers. These constitute the various branches of the Land Forces, or the Army generally; and the differences existing between them are defined by their conditions of service. The Regular Forces are engaged to devote the whole of their time to the service of Her Majesty; the Reserve Forces become, when called upon, a substantial part of the Regular Forces; the Militia engage to give a limited portion of their time, and they are not compellable to serve out of the United Kingdom; while the Volunteers and Yeomanry engage to give their services only in case of an invasion, or a dread of invasion, or for purposes of training and instruction. In the Repeal Bill, which it will be necessary to introduce as a matter of form, I propose, with the assent of the House, to eliminate that provision which places the Yeomanry in a rather invidious position—namely, their special liability to be called out in case of civil disturbance. We see no reason in these days why the Yeomanry should not serve for the purpose for which their supply was voted in the Estimates, and why they should not take their proper place, which is to serve as Light Cavalry, and to act as part of the Army of the country. We propose to place them upon the same footing as the Volunteers, and to relieve them from the very onerous and invidious position in which they are now placed by the existing Act. When any of these men come up on actual military service this Bill regards them as soldiers to all intents and purposes. We have only made more clear that which the House assented to under Viscount Cardwell's Act; but we put it on a footing which we hope will not be misunderstood by the country, and will be appreciated by those to whom it refers. I am anxious that this Bill should be brought in. It is a matter of too great length to explain in all its provisions; but I am sure the House will far better understand the Bill from having it before them, and I only wish that I had been able to place the matter more clearly. The amount of matter was, however, so great, and the Bill was of such an extent, that I felt the shorter and more explicit I could make my statement the better. One word I would like to say, and I trust it will not be in the slightest degree misconstrued as being anything whatever in the nature of putting undue pressure on the House. This Bill, though of some dimensions, with the exceptions which I have stated, is practically a revision and a codification of the existing law. The House, as distinctly as it could affirm anything without an actual vote, declared that it was unwilling again to pass the Mutiny Act in its present form. I do not suppose that even those who might oppose it most would wish that the Army should be left without any discipline, or without any regulation. I cannot but feel that it will be my duty, though I should be loth to do it, if we cannot get well forward with this Bill, to propose a short Bill, continuing the existing Mutiny Act for a short space of time. Considering the very strong objections taken to the existing Bill by hon. Gentlemen above and below the Gangway upon the opposite side of the House, and by many hon. Members behind me, I felt it was my duty, as early as possible, to lay this Bill upon the Table of the House. I do not wish to speak of myself, although I have spared no effort in this matter; but I am bound to say that not one single moment has been lost by the very able Parliamentary counsel, by my Colleagues, and by my advisers. Through the summer time and the winter to the present day they have been unremitting in their efforts; and I felt I must not shrink from endeavouring to place it as early as I could before the House. I have done my utmost to redeem the promise given by my Predecessor. I am anxious that the present Mutiny Act should not be passed again in its present form; but, on the other hand, I must lay the matter frankly before the House. Unless we can pass this Act in a reasonable time, it will be necessary to apply for a short Bill to continue the Mutiny Act. It is a course I should deprecate, because it is asking the House to stereotype, for a further period, a law they were at that moment condemning. Without putting any undue pressure on the House, I think it right to indicate the position in which we stand, and now I must leave the Bill to recommend itself. I have not attempted to recommend it by any extraneous support, or by any attempt at bringing highly-coloured illustrations of matters of sentiment into connection with it. It is a strict matter of business; and I have endeavoured, I hope not altogether without success, to place it before the House in a business-like manner. I have only to express the hope that the House will see that this is not a matter of Government or of Party, but of business, will deal with it in a business-like way, and in a manner becoming its own duty.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law relating to Discipline and Regulation of the Army."—(Mr. Secretary Stanley.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had no voice to support his right hon. and gallant Friend at any length; but he wished to say that he agreed fully with the observation that this was no question of Party. He was sure that his right hon. and gallant Friend would receive from both sides of the House all the assistance he desired in carrying so desirable a measure to its completion.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked what was to be done with respect to the Articles of War?

COLONEL MURE said, there was one thing which he had not heard mentioned. It was one of the recommendations of the Committee that a check should be put on the power of revising officers to increase the sentences awarded by courts martial. He hoped that the point would be dealt with in the new Bill.

MAJOR NOLAN observed that there was no concealing the fact that the Bill would greatly strengthen the hands of the Crown and of the War Office. The Bill could be divided into two parts—namely, the administrative and judicial portion. The administrative part, which dealt with re-enlistment and the re-engagement of the Reserves and soldiers going on foreign service, seemed to be excellent; but, as to the second part, which included the alterations proposed in judicial matters—such as altering the number of cases in which soldiers could be tried by the commanding officer, and in giving commanding officers greater powers, and in bringing fresh classes under the scope of the Act—they were all subjects which would require great consideration, and he was afraid they were contrary to existing usage. He might observe that, in his opinion, the appeal given to a soldier from the decision of his commanding officer to a court martial would be altogether illusory.

MR. PARNELL thought the preferable course to adopt under the circumstances would be to allow the old Mutiny Acts to stand for another year rather than to run hastily through a Bill like the present. This was the more necessary, as the present Bill was not intended for one year only, but as an Act to be enforced by a sort of continuous Act from year to year. He would venture to point out to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War that he could hardly ask the House to pass a Bill of such a complicated character as this, involving such great changes, and such points of detail, in the limited number of Sittings at the disposal of the Government between that time and the 26th of April. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had hinted that if there was not sufficient time to pass the Bill he would propose to continue by a short Act the present Mutiny Act. In his opinion, that would be a course much open to objection, for there were great Constitutional reasons why the present Mutiny Bills should not be continued by a continuous Act. But still, if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was really determined to carry out this Bill during the present Session, and to give the House full opportunities for discussion, he could see no reason why there should not be a general understanding that the Army and Marine Mutiny Acts of last year should not be passed without opposition. But unless some pledge were given by the Government, it would be a very questionable course, for it was not probable that there would be time to carry this Bill by the 26th of April. If, however, by a common understanding, the Government were allowed to pass the old Mutiny Acts without opposition, and afterwards, in pursuance of their pledge, to proceed to make the best Act possible out of the materials which had been furnished, every object would be attained.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK, having listened very attentively to the interesting and lucid statement of the Secretary of State for War, thought the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was perfectly correct in saying that the alterations proposed followed very closely the suggestions and representations made by the Committee over which the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt) so ably presided. He could not exactly enter into the objections of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), nor, he confessed, could he understand the course he proposed. It appeared to him that at the various Sittings of the Committee he had had an opportunity of raising all the questions, which, no doubt, the hon. Member would give them an opportunity of hearing again in that House. He thought that if this Bill were at once printed and circulated, the necessity of adjourning the matter for another year would not arise.

MR. PARNELL said, that he did not propose any such course; all he meant to say was that they could do with the old Acts until this Act could be passed, and when passed it should at once supersede the old Acts.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK would repeat his suggestion that if the Bill were printed and circulated at once, then, between the present time and the 26th of April, hon. Members would have every opportunity of raising objections and making Amendments. He believed that long before that date the Bill could be worked into an effective Act. He wished to say, with regard to the proposed alterations now announced, that he could not express his entire concurrence with them, nor did he endorse every principle laid down. There was one point, in particular, with which he could not at all agree. He alluded to the changes in the position of half-pay officers; for he was not prepared to say whether the alterations suggested with regard to those officers would not make a grave and material alteration in their Constitutional position. But nearly all the alterations enumerated by the Secretary of State for War were in the direction of recognizing fraudulent re-enlistment as a breach of a commercial contract instead of an offence for which there should be a great punishment, and such alterations were decidedly in the right direction. More especially, he thought, that the power of giving soldiers, who might have been misled into desertion, an opportunity of retrieving their character by serving faithfully abroad was a step that would recommend itself to the House. He did not intend to take up the time of the House by dwelling on the various points; but would only say that, with the alterations now proposed, the old Acts might be converted into a good, wise, and humane law.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE said, that as a Member of the Committee he must state his opinion that the Report made by it was both incomplete and unsatisfactory. Various important suggestions were made by different Members of the Committee which were hardly listened to; and hon. Members making those suggestions were repeatedly told that, owing to pressure of time, there was no opportunity of taking proper evidence. Amongst the suggestions made was one raising the important question as to whether a Court of Inquiry should be placed under well-defined rules, and also whether there should be courts of appeal to refer the decisions of courts martial to. There were several other important questions, intimately connected with this Bill, which were not listened to. He might mention that as to whether the Commander-in-Chief should be placed under the five years' rule or not, the present Commander-in-Chief had been 20 years at the head of the Army; and it was a most important matter to decide whether or not he ought to be placed under the five years' rule. For his part, he did not see why any distinction should exist in his case. He thought the Committee should be re-appointed, to discuss these and other very important questions.

COLONEL STANLEY: I will endeavour to answer, to the best of my power, the various questions which have been addressed to me; but I must first thank the House for the very courteous manner in which they have received my statement. With regard to the question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir Alexander Gordon), I have to say this—we have preserved in the new Bill all the powers of the Crown contained in the former Mutiny Act. As a matter of fact, when we came to specify the different crimes, it was found of so little practical advantage to specify the Articles of War side by side with the statutory provisions, that we have only referred to them. I do not say that under no circumstances will a change be made; but I think, as a matter of fact, we should be content with keeping the power. I think that it is right, in a Bill of these dimensions, not to allow any matters to be unnecessarily introduced; but wherever any powers exist in any Article they will not be allowed to fall into desuetude. With respect to the question put by the hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure), we have not given distinct instructions in the Bill as to courts martial; but, as the hon. and gallant Gentleman is aware, some matters cannot properly find a place in the Statute, but will have to be dealt with by regulations. The regulations will be brought under the notice of the House, and will then admit of challenge. I am afraid of addressing the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) in his absence, and cannot, therefore, perfectly reply to his question. I may say, however, that I hope he will find his fears as to the power of commanding officers, and as to bringing other classes under the power of the War Office, altogether fallacious, and that the change proposed will prove beneficial. With regard to the proposal of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), I confess that I am placed in a position of some difficulty. It is clear that if the Army is not to be left without any Discipline Bill whatever, you must have either the existing Bill or some other. No man had more objections to the existing Act than the hon. Member for Meath; and I thought that he, above all men, would have been glad to welcome any change. But if we do not pass this Bill before the present Mutiny Act expires, it is obvious we must have some provision for carrying on the government of the Army. I expressly guarded myself from putting any undue pressure on the House; although I did express a hope that we might make such progress with the Bill as to render the continuance of the present Mutiny Bill unnecessary. In answer to my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock), I may say that it is perfectly impossible to explain all the different points of this Bill in a limited time—and I wish the Bill to explain itself as soon as possible. With respect to the question of half-pay officers, I admitted that though I have done my best to adopt what I believe to be a course consistent with the existing law, and in accordance with the altered circumstances under which officers now retire, yet I am in a position of some difficulty; and I have no doubt considerable good will result from a discussion being raised upon the question in this House. With regard to the observations of the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne), I must say that I do not see what good would be likely to result from the re-appointment of a Committee for the purposes of the Bill. I do not think it came within the purview of that Committee to deal either with the tenure or the limit of Staff appointments. I think I have now answered the questions put to me; but I ought, perhaps, to have stated that this Bill technically—even when passed into law—will have no force except as representing a code of discipline for the Army. In that respect I hope it will be, more or less, permanent; but it will receive annual force, and be brought under the notice of Parliament, from year to year, by an annual Army Discipline and Regulation Act—a short Bill, reciting the number of men voted in the first Vote of the Estimates, and adopting this Bill and giving it effect until such time as the annual Act itself will expire. I trust I have answered the various questions put to me; and I hope there will be other opportunities granted on further progress of this Bill, when I shall be able to give fuller explanations.

MR. BIGGAR wished to say one word on behalf of his hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell). What he wished to convey was that if there was not sufficient time to pass this Bill before the 26th of April then that the present Mutiny Bill should be renewed, subject to a pledge by the Government to give sufficient time to push this Bill through during the remainder of the Session. Then, so soon as this Bill became law, the old Mutiny Act should be dropped, and the new one take its place. In that way there would be a Bill of some sort; and at the earliest possible moment an amended Act would become law.

COLONEL STANLEY: I think I quite understood the point which was raised by the hon. Member for Meath; but it is necessary we should bear in mind that there are other parties to be considered besides those sitting in this House—namely, the officers and men of the Service—and we must have this Bill in their hands by some definite date, so that they may know the law under which they are acting. We have two alternatives—the one to confirm the present Bill, and the other to pass a better Bill to supersede it. I confess I see little advantage in taking up the time, which might be well occupied in passing this Bill through Committee, in passing the present Mutiny Act. It would be far preferable to add a clause to the present Mutiny Act that it should exist only to the end of the Session. What we want is one Mutiny Act, and not three.

ASSIZES BILL.—[BILL 83.]

(Sir Matthew Ridley, Mr. Secretary Cross.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, that although he supported the Bill—the object of which was to give effect to a wish expressed by the House in relation to the Assizes Act of 1876—yet there were one or two practical disadvantages to the present Assize system. He was encouraged by the fact that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary was amenable to suggestions to point out to him the matters to which he referred. The House was aware that this Bill carried into effect what had already been sanctioned by the Assizes Act of 1876, and practically carried out the expression of opinion of this House, that it was desirable that no prisoner should be kept in custody untried for more than the space of three months. He should give his most cordial support to the Bill; but there were one or two practical objections to the system of centralization which it effectuated. The object of centralization was solely for the purpose of economizing judicial power; and if there were more judicial power, he did not think that anyone would wish the system of centralization to be carried out. It was desirable that prisoners should be tried in the counties where their crimes were committed, inasmuch as it brought home the administration of justice to the criminal classes, and had a good effect upon the community. The trial of prisoners in their own counties had a good effect also upon those concerned in the administration of justice—as the magistrates—and he knew of no class which benefited by the removal of prisoners from their own county, except the public, by the fact that judicial power was economized. As matters remained at present, there were no means of carrying out the opinion of the House, except by the system of centralization. But the practical objections that occurred to that system were worthy of consideration. Prisoners were, before conviction, supposed to be innocent, and it was, no doubt, desirable that they should be left as short time as possible in prison untried. But the system of centralization produced some evils. The effect of removing a prisoner a distance from the county where he had committed his crime took away some of his means of defence, and removed him from the persons who could come forward to help him. He had to take with him all his witnesses—perhaps the clergyman of his parish—to testify to his character; and as he could not, as a rule, pay his witnesses, it could not be expected that volunteer witnesses would give up their time to go long distances in order to testify to his character. The result was that prisoners went to trial without the witnesses whom they would have had if tried in their own county town. That was an injury inflicted upon those very persons for whom this system of Assizes had been established. Again, when before the magistrates, a prisoner, no doubt, employed a solicitor to defend him; but when tried hundreds of miles off, his solicitor could not conduct his defence, and thus prisoners were frequently left undefended at their trial. Therefore, those persons, for whose interests these Acts were passed, were sent to a distance from places where their offences had been committed without witnesses and without legal advice or assistance. Another matter which fell heavily on those concerned he would call attention to. No doubt, the Government might say they had done something to mitigate this evil by giving an allowance of £20, if a Judge certified to that effect. But that did not apply to witnesses to character, to whom no compensation was given. It was a great practical evil, and had been drawn to his attention by persons who had been witnesses, that when prisoners were sent to trial, witnesses for the prosecution had to attend, frequently under circumstances of great hardship. Amongst the witnesses were married women with families, and girls under 15 years of age; and to those persons the only allowance made was for their own expenses for travelling and for keep. Although the distance might be from the Welsh side of Monmouthshire to Gloucester, they had to travel without anyone to take charge of them, and to stop for days in a strange town where they knew no one, because the only expenses allowed to such witnesses were for themselves, and not for anyone to accompany them. No doubt, this was a small matter; but to those people on whom it fell it became a great grievance.

It would be better for the House to take notice of this small matter, and prevent the hardship from arising. He had been told of an instance where a whole family were kept nearly a week in a town, and the only money paid to them was to one member of the family as a witness. No doubt, so long as the judicial strength remained where it was, this system of centralization must be adopted; but he hoped that it would not be carried into effect, except where absolutely necessary. It had an evil effect, both upon the public, by reason of removing the administration of justice from before their eyes, and upon prisoners and witnesses in subjecting them to hardships.

VISCOUNT EMLYN wished to know whether, if the Bill passed, the full Winter Sessions could be abolished? He had understood that it was not intended to abolish them.

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY observed, that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) had only done justice to his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary in stating that he had endeavoured to carry out the grouping of counties in such a manner as to minimize the inconveniences which must of necessity attend the system, and so to give effect to the expressed wish of the House that prisoners should not remain untried for more than three months. No doubt, some disadvantages resulted from the system of centralization. But if, in some cases, witnesses had to go a considerable distance, yet, at the present time, they had frequently to go as great a distance when trials took place in their own counties. To meet the expenses incurred, an allowance of £20 was made. He must also observe that the object of these Acts was not only to economize judicial power, but to save also the time of sheriffs, jurors, and other persons necessarily concerned in the transaction of judicial business. The House would see that this Bill was a necessary sequence to the principle laid down by the House—that no prisoner should remain in custody for a longer period than three months.

MR. PAGET remarked that the Bill provided that the Winter Assize Act of 1876 should be construed as if it were therein enacted, with the substitution of Spring Assizes for Winter Assizes, and of the months of March, April, and May, for the months of November, December, and January respectively. He should like to know whether the Act was to extend the Winter Assizes into those months of the Spring?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, it was clear that the Bill enabled the Judges to hold four Assizes in the year by groups of counties. The months were purposely omitted, in order to make that possible; and it would be impossible for that to take place if they kept the Assizes to the Winter. This Act was passed to enable them to hold Assizes in two or three other months. The Judges were now framing a scheme for the regulation of Assizes, by which those for criminal and civil business were to be held early in the year, and criminal Assizes only were to be held in the Spring.

VISCOUNT EMLYN observed, that in his county (Carmarthen) the Spring Assizes were held in January. He wished to know whether, under this Bill, a power would not be given to abolish either or both of the full Assizes now held in every county, and to substitute for them Assizes for a union of counties. He hoped that words would be inserted in the Bill to make it clear that this would not be done.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, that, as he understood, the Assizes in which civil and criminal business took place were to be held in the counties; but that the criminal business only was to be held elsewhere. With reference to the Spring Assizes being held in January, that only occurred through the old Winter Assizes being carried over Christmas. If there was any doubt, it could be put at rest by providing, upon the Report of the Bill, that only two Assizes should take place out of the counties.

MR. PAGET suggested that a provision should be inserted carrying into effect the regulation that two distinct holdings of Assize should be held in the counties.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS did not think that any difficulty could arise with regard to the Bill on the point suggested; but he would undertake that, if necessary, words should be added to make the provisions perfectly clear.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time To-morrow.

SUMMARY JURISDICTION BILL.

(*Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. Attorney General,
Mr. Solicitor General, Sir Matthew Ridley.*)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Ascheton Cross.)

Mr. HOPWOOD said, that he felt some regret to see a Motion on the Paper by his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to refer this Bill to a Select Committee. He was so confident that this matter had been thoroughly ventilated during the time that it had been before the House—namely, the last two years—that he regretted to see even the slightest obstruction opposed to it. He should have thought that the time which would be spent in sending this Bill to a Select Committee might have been spared, for he did not see what fresh information could be required.

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS said, that he was quite as anxious as the hon. and learned Member that this Bill should pass speedily. For a long time he had expressed his opinion that a great number of persons were sent to prison who never ought to go there. He thought no person ought to go to gaol unless he had been tried. The experience he had gained in the Office which he had at present the honour to hold had impressed him strongly in favour of the Bill brought forward by the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. M. T. Bass) as to imprisonment for debt, and he should be glad to see it pass in some form or other. His feeling was that if a man went to prison he ought to be punished; and if a man did not deserve punishment he ought not to go to prison. He had viewed the inside of gaols, and it was anything but a pleasant sight to see the number of persons idling away their time there—absolutely useless members of society. He hoped the time would come, and during the period that he held his present position, when a salutary change would be made in this respect. The hon. and learned Member had asked him why he had sent this Bill to a Select Committee? He had done so for three reasons. In the first place, he could not foretell whether a great number of Amendments would be set down to the Bill or not. There were certain other matters which prevented his seeing his way clearly to carry the Bill through if a considerable number of Amendments were set down; but, having discussed those Amendments upstairs, they would be more readily disposed of in the House. In the next place, there were technical matters relating to warrants, and things of that kind, which wanted to be scrutinized by learned gentlemen accustomed to the administration of justice. Lastly, this Bill only applied to England; for with regard to Ireland, he was happy to say that the law there was in a much more advanced state than in this country. The English law was a step or two behind the Irish law; and, therefore, it would be impossible to make this Bill, in its present form, applicable to Ireland as well as England, because it would not fit into the Irish Summary Jurisdiction Acts. Therefore, he thought that if the Irish Members who took an interest in the question were enabled to discuss the question in Committee, they would be enabled to appreciate more fully a Bill which the Attorney General for Ireland would introduce dealing with the Irish law. That, he thought, would be the best course and most acceptable to the Irish Members and the people of Ireland. For the reasons he had stated, he wished to send the Bill before a Select Committee; and he hoped that the House would allow him to take the Chair on that Committee, and that no time would be lost in bringing the matter forward.

Mr. W. S. STANHOPE said, that considerable anxiety had been expressed by some magistrates in Yorkshire as to the scope of the Bill. A largely increased power was given by it to Petty Sessions, and a Committee of Quarter Sessions had been appointed to consider those provisions. He was glad to hear that the Bill would be referred to a Select Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee.

And, on March 18, Committee nominated as follows:—Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. Dodson, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Watkin Williams, Mr. Hopwood, Mr. Woodd, Mr. Paget, Mr. Courtauld, Mr. Spencer Stanhope, Colonel Colthurst, Mr. Floyer, Mr. Walter, Mr. Rodwell, and Sir Colman Raskleigh:—Five to be the quorum.

ARMY EDUCATION—LITERARY AND PHYSICAL COMPETITIONS.

OBSERVATIONS.

EARL FORTESCUE rose to call the attention of the House to the Report of the Joint Committee of the War Office and the Civil Service Commissioners appointed to consider whether the present literary examinations for the Army should be supplemented by physical competition. The noble Earl said, he felt some apology was due from him as a civilian for troubling their Lordships on such a subject. But he had been brought much into contact with the Army by his personal investigations into the sanitary condition of our barracks and military hospitals in 1856—investigations which he had been led to make after years of experience in sanitary administration, by observing the excessive sickness and mortality among our troops even at home compared with the civil population; though most soldiers were in the prime of life, and all had been certified as sound before admission into the ranks. Those investigations cost him personally very dear, for whilst he was engaged in them he contracted a sickness which destroyed one of his eyes, and permanently impaired the sight of the other, and which sent him an exile abroad for many successive winters. But this had not diminished the interest which had thus been kindled in him about the Army—an interest latterly increased by having two sons holding commissions in it. In calling attention to the Report of the Commissioners, he might, perhaps, be allowed to remark that he had never on any occasion when he had addressed their Lordships on this subject grounded the views he had laid before them on any hardship done to deserving young men by their being excluded from the Army by the operation of the present system. He had always rested his case exclusively on the injustice done to the Public Service by the selection of any but those who promised to make in every way the most efficient officers. One of the chief reasons for instituting competitive examinations, after the abolition of Army Purchase, was the overwhelming number of candidates who were anxious to obtain the honour of serving the Queen in the Army. It was justly said—"Let Her Majesty take the best of them." He had always accepted this principle; but what he desired to see was that the best men "all round" should be those who obtained commissions, and not merely those who were most advanced in book learning; and he did not see how the really best men could be secured without supplementing intellectual with physical competition. The Secretary of State for War was reported in Hansard to have said last year that the officers who had recently joined the Army were not at all of a lower standard now than those who joined before competitive examination became the rule; far from that, taking them all round, a finer body of young men could not be found. But, even if—which he (Earl Fortescue) did not doubt—that was the case, the remark was quite irrelevant. For the question was not whether the general physique of the successful candidates, under the present system, was good; but whether, under an improved system, it would not be better. When Purchase was abolished, it was not abolished on the ground that the British officers at that time were, as a rule, inefficient. Not to go back to the old successes of the Army in the Peninsula and at Waterloo, he ventured to say that for many years our Army, small as it was, had been rendered illustrious by many glorious deeds of arms, both as regarded gallantry and skill. The conquest of Afghanistan, the conquest of Scinde and the Punjaub, and more especially the Crimean War and the Indian Mutiny, shed a high lustre on our Army. The disasters in Afghanistan did not arise from any default of our regimental officers, but from the successful treachery of the Native Leaders, from the credulity of our diplomats, and the helplessness of our bed-ridden General. The suffering and losses in the Crimean War were less attributable to the Military than to the Civil Department. He ventured to say that the competitive system of examination was not introduced into the Army because the Purchase system had given them bad officers, but simply because, though the general results of that system were good, it was thought to be improvable, and that still better results might be obtained. This was equally the case now. Therefore, the argument of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War was utterly beside the question. Considering how small and costly our Army was, it was of the utmost importance to bring it up to the highest pitch of efficiency attainable; and they ought to be satisfied with nothing less, not only with regard to the general body of officers, but with regard, as far as practicable, to every individual officer. He thought they heard a great deal too much of the unfair advantage which might be given to some candidates by having certain tests of physical excellence allowed to count in examinations—as if the object was to give as equal a chance as possible to men of unequal qualifications—in sporting language, to handicap unequal horses so as to secure a good race, instead of letting the really best horse win. But he considered that their object ought to be simply to get the best article they could for their money—to get the young man selected as an officer whose qualifications in every way, physically, intellectually, and morally, afforded the best promise of future efficiency in the performance of his duties. When he brought the subject before their Lordships last year, he suggested that riding should be one of the subjects allowed to count in examinations. Strong objection was made to this suggestion on the ground that only the sons of rich men had an opportunity of learning horsemanship. This, however, certainly did not apply to walking, running, leaping, or swimming. But he (Earl Fortescue) did not believe riding

was near as costly an accomplishment as it was often stated to be, and he believed that a deal might be very cheaply learned at the riding-school in most large towns during their dull season. In the country, he had certainly known many young men, sons of far from wealthy parents, who somehow or other managed to get frequently mounted. But, assuming it to be as costly as it was said to be, he did not see why the claims of a candidate, coming already qualified in that respect to render the Queen service, should be ignored. He did not see why such a candidate should not be considered, ceteris paribus, preferable to another, who, if he learned to ride, must learn not at his own but the country's expense. In engaging servants, people asked themselves which out of the number of candidates were the most likely to be useful, not whether they had been placed in comparison with others at unfair disadvantage as regarded their training for service. And that, he thought, ought to be the principle adopted in selecting officers for the Army. He put the question altogether on the ground of economy. There was an accumulation of authorities in favour of adding physical to purely intellectual qualifications, to which he would now call attention. Before he adverted to the Report of the Joint Committee, however, he must be allowed to tender his thanks to Her Majesty's Government for having named a Committee which comprised men of such high military and scientific attainments, and of such high literary character. The list of names spoke for itself. Three were distinguished officers, two of the civilians were of well-known literary culture, and the Chairman, the noble Lord opposite (Lord Hampton), had for some 40 years taken a prominent part in the House of Commons, and had held some of the highest Offices in the State. All these unanimously reported in favour of the desirableness of the addition of physical qualifications in examinations for the Army. The Committee had sought the best advice and information which could be obtained from various sources—from the Army Medical Department, from Inspectors of Military Gymnasias, and from the Superintendent of the Woolwich Riding Establishment, and had printed 23 replies to letters which had been addressed by them to the Heads of the three great

Military Colleges and the Masters of the great educational institutions of the country—such as Eton, Harrow, Rugby, Uppingham, Marlborough, and others. Of these, nine were strongly favourable to physical competition, fifteen were favourable, one doubtful, one was for a qualifying examination, one was rather against than for it, and only three were strongly against the proposal. The Report states—

"On the general question of the desirableness of the proposed addition we apprehend that there can be little difference of opinion. Whether regard be had to the direct utility of physical vigour in the discharge of military duties, or to its importance as connected with valuable mental and moral qualities, we entertain no doubt that some account should be taken of it in such examinations, provided that the value set upon it be not such as to depreciate superior intellectual ability, that proper tests can be agreed upon, and that satisfactory means can be found of applying those tests. . . . We recommend that competitions should be held under the following six heads: (1) riding; (2) walking; (3) running; (4) leaping; (5) swimming; (6) gymnastics. . . . We propose that no candidate should be allowed to enter as a competitor under more than three heads, and that the total number of marks allotted to the physical competition should be obtainable by adequate proficiency in any three. . . . We have already intimated our opinion that nothing should be done to interfere with the reward due to superior intellectual merit. But in competitions for entrance to the Royal Military College, as in most large competitions, it is commonly found that below the degree of superior merit, and on each side of the line which separates the successful from the unsuccessful, there occurs a long list of candidates showing a comparative level of mediocrity; and we consider that no undue weight will be given to physical excellence, if it be allowed practically to decide the question of success or failure among candidates of this class, while helping also to determine the position of the others. Looking, therefore, to the fact that at these examinations, in which about 100 candidates are usually selected, the average difference between the 50th and the 150th is about 1,000 marks, we think that the desired result would be attained if the method of marking were so arranged as to give about 1,000 marks to the best candidate in the physical competition."

Sir John Adye strongly opposed, but the Governor of Sandhurst and the Commandant of the Staff College quite as strongly supported, the Committee's recommendations. Sir Archibald Alison says—

"It seems to me very advisable that, in a profession where (especially in the junior ranks) physical fitness in addition to mental capacity is of great consequence, a certain weight should be given to these qualities. . . . No one can have a higher regard for literary qualifications than I have; but I think it is a mistake to attach, in examinations, no value whatever to physical ones in an essentially (physically speaking) hard-working profession like the Army."

The Rev. E. Thring, the very successful Master of Uppingham, writes—

"In my opinion the proposal to give marks for physical qualifications in the Civil Service is most valuable. Much harm is done in the world by men who are all head, and have none of the powers or sympathies of ordinary humanity; who, in the good old phrase, 'have never been boys.' Such men often attain to power, but are bad rulers of men. On this account, as well as on the more obvious one of common usefulness, I hail the acknowledgment of physical life-power."

The Rev. H. M. Butler, of Harrow, writes—

The Rev. J. J. Hornby, of Eton, writes—

"With regard to these proposals generally, I must say that I welcome them very warmly."

The Rev. E. H. Bradby, of Haileybury, says—

"Among those who come between the 50th and the 150th on the list in a Sandhurst, or even Woolwich examination, I should much prefer, had I to pick men for Her Majesty's service, those who could ride or run or swim well, for instance, to those who could not. The tendency of the change would be to make idlers and 'loafers' (if the expression may be pardoned) among the clever boys look to their physical exercises, and to give a fairer chance to a very useful class of young Englishmen, who are in some danger of being crushed out by the purely literary character of our present competitions."

He quoted last year the opinion of the late Sir John Burgoyne, who expressed to him his fear lest mere book learning should have too much weight given it to the exclusion of other qualifications for the Army; and he had mentioned that the present Bishop of Exeter, when, as Head Master of Rugby, he had a commission in the Army placed at his disposal, instituted a competitive examination for it, partly physical, partly intellectual, which resulted in its being won by a good, but not the best scholar in the school—the captain of the cricket eleven. He hoped that the principle of the recommendation of this very able Committee, fortified by the preponderance of opinion of the best educational and military authorities would prevail, and that physical as well as intellectual competition would be adopted as a test of qualification for admission into Her Majesty's Service. Perhaps he might be asked why he had not earlier expressed his views upon this subject? But his reason was that though he had long entertained them he had, perhaps weakly, shrunk from publicly expressing them while his son was preparing for the Army, lest he should be supposed to be actuated by personal rather than public considerations. As soon, however, as his son had won his commission in competitive examination in 1876, he took the earliest opportunity of publicly speaking elsewhere on the subject, and last year had addressed their Lordships upon it. With regard to that son and some other young friends of his just embarked for South Africa, he must add that he did not think they would be likely to discharge their duties the less efficiently there, because from their boyhood they had been accustomed to hunt and shoot, to ride and walk long distances over rough ground in the pursuit of sport, to surmount obstacles, to disregard fatigue, and cheerfully endure the inclemency of the weather.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he was sure the noble Earl need not have made the excuse for not bringing this matter forward sooner that he did not wish to be suspected of having interested motives. He was struck by the admission of the noble Earl at the end of his speech that the young officers who had gone out to South Africa would not be the less efficient because they had been accustomed from their earliest youth to hunt, ride, walk long distances, and disregard fatigue and inclement weather. Now, these young officers were only fair specimens of the young officers they now got in the Army, and this was rather an argument against the noble Earl, that they ought to adopt some system other than was now pursued. In fact, the noble Earl admitted that they now got young men who were well qualified, and all he desired was that they should take some course by which they could obtain young men better qualified still. No doubt the thing to be done was to get the very best officers they could. It would be a very bad excuse to say that to introduce such and such a competition or to refrain from introducing such and such a competition in the Army would be unfair to this or to that candidate.

That would be no argument at all—what they wanted to do was to get the best men for the Public Service. Some time ago it would have been possible, in the old days of nomination, to select this or that man, and to those who were not selected it would not be a cause of complaint, and nothing would have been said against the fairness of the selection. But now, after deliberate consideration, they had resorted to a different principle, and competitive examination had been resorted to. The first principle of this system, and one without which it could not continue to exist, was strict fairness to all competitors; and when a man had in open competition, with a fair field and no favour, come to the front, they were bound to assume that they had got what they wanted—namely, the best man for the Public Service. The noble Earl's suggestion was that the system, as at present administered, had so far broken down that purely intellectual examination did not give them the best men for the Public Service. If that were proved, and it could be shown that a better class of men could be obtained by introducing some such physical qualification as the noble Earl had intimated, and as the Committee had recommended, then no doubt it would be the duty of the Government, at all hazards and all inconveniences, to introduce such a modification into their scheme of examination as would enable a physical competition to be held. But the testimony which had been brought before the War Office, and indeed before the Committee themselves, was that they did get a body of as fine young men as they could obtain by any other means; and that being the case—it not being necessary on account of the physical deterioration of our young officers, or of the class of men who offered themselves for that position, it not being alleged that there was any reason on account of such physical deterioration to resort to any further system—it was a matter of grave consideration whether the system which had been established, and which worked so well, should be thrown aside. No one could have a greater admiration than he for the great ability and industry displayed by the Committee who had made this Report. Their authority was deservedly great, and from the high position they occupied their opinion was worth much attention. But they had been rather hesitating in their approval of this scheme of physical competition. His noble Friend (Earl Fortescue) had read a part of Paragraph 14 of the Report; but he did not allow sufficient weight to the first line, which said—

“We have already intimated our opinion that nothing should be done to interfere with the reward due to superior intellectual merit.”

If they were to give marks for physical competition, how was it possible not to interfere with the purely intellectual competition—the literary competition? Sir John Adye said—

“I do not recommend the present proposal for the following reasons:—The number of marks proposed to be given are considerable, and will therefore really influence the general rule.”

The opinion of the Governor of the Royal Military College was that the physical competition which it was proposed to introduce would not be compatible, and would certainly interfere with the purely literary competition now existing. If the system of intellectual examination had not been proved to be insufficient, and as it was not even alleged that they did not get now properly qualified young men to present themselves for examination, then, was it worth while, in face of such evidence, to change the present system? The noble Earl had quoted Dr. Carver, the Head Master of Dulwich College, who said that high moral energy might exist in connection with a sickly and feeble frame. That was quite true; but had they any allegation that they had now among their young officers men of feeble and sickly frames? Quite the contrary. Dr. Carver himself admitted that he had generally found those young men who were most distinguished in physical competitions in the school were also those found most generally at the top of the literary examinations. It was in evidence from other quarters that it was a general rule that when physical fitness and development were found in the young men who were of the age that those young men were who came up for examination, that mental fitness generally existed as well. Therefore, there was no need for changing the present system. Under these circumstances, the Under Secretary of State for War, calling to his assistance some of the military authorities whom he had constantly around him, consulted with them whether it would be advisable to introduce such a change; and the result he had arrived at was that it would not be advisable and would be almost impracticable. He (Viscount Bury) had now shown why it would be inexpedient and unnecessary to make any change at the present moment. He would now show that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to carry out such a change. First of all, when and how were they to introduce these physical examinations? Seven or eight hundred young men now came up to London for examination twice a year; they were quartered at various lodgings in town—as the noble Earl no doubt knew—somewhat to the embarrassment of their fathers and guardians; they had to remain knocking about London during the whole time of these examinations. It was very inconvenient that they should be detained longer in town than was absolutely necessary. When were they to introduce these physical examinations, and where were they to introduce them? About three-fifths of the young men who came up were, to use their own phrase, “spun in the preliminary;” in other words, were found wanting in the first stage of the examination. Those young men were at once, or as soon as possible, sent back to their homes, and dismissed with the usual information that they were not to go in for further examination. So large a proportion of young men being dismissed, it would be obviously not worth while to examine the whole 800 or 900 young men in physical competition before the intellectual competition commenced. If they only passed on for physical examination those who had already proved themselves to a certain extent intellectually qualified, they would introduce that antagonism between physical and intellectual qualifications which it was the object of the Committee themselves entirely to keep out of consideration. Supposing they did adopt that course, were they to examine them all before they went in for their final literary examination, or were they to examine only those who finally passed for commissions? These were practical considerations to consider before a change was made. It was only fair to the noble Earl who brought forward this subject that he should go into details on this point. If they were to examine all the young men, they must either give marks for their physical acquirements, or they must make them undergo a pass examination in physical qualifications. He would suppose the case of a gentleman whose son had been educated for the Army for some years, and had passed his preliminary and final literary examination, but who was rejected because he could not run a certain number of miles an hour or leap a bar 4 feet 2 inches in height. That gentleman would, he thought, have every right to complain of such a system, and he appealed to the common sense of the House whether they would be able to keep it up for a single year. If they were to give marks for physical excellence, then they would have to decide how far these should displace the marks for intellectual ability. Should it be found that physically qualified men ceased to come forward to compete for admission to the Army, then it would be time enough to make a change. It must be borne in mind that at present all the candidates were subjected to medical examination—and, as he thought, to too many such examinations—they were examined every time they presented themselves for a fresh literary competition. They had therefore, at the present moment, every guarantee that neither the feeble nor cripples were admitted into the Army—that none, in fact, would be admitted into the Service but those who were sound in life and limb. The noble Earl had quoted Hansard to prove that his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War had out of Office approved of these physical examinations. It was true that his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War was at first disposed to carry out the recommendation of the Committee; but, on considering it and taking the opinion of military authorities, he found that difficulties of an insurmountable nature presented themselves against giving effect to it, and, therefore, he would not advise the Government or Parliament to endeavour to carry it out.

LORD HAMPTON said, he could not agree with what had fallen from his noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for War, that the difficulties referred to were insurmountable; and he must express his regret at the decision which the War Office authorities had come to. This proposal of the Committee had been supported by the weight of very great authorities, and the Committee—of which he was himself a Member—were unanimous in their opinion as to what ought to be done. The Committee examined the subject with very remarkable care, and had entered into every detail; and in justice to them he felt bound to say that they did not leave out of view any consideration in reference to those physical difficulties which had been mentioned by his noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for War, and had arrived conclusively at the opinion that there was nothing in those difficulties which ought to be considered as being insuperable. His noble Friend opposite (Earl Fortescue) had referred to the Appendix to the Report. In it their Lordships would find set forth the opinions of three distinguished Military Officers and of 18 Head Masters of their great Public Schools in favour of the Report, and they were men who were eminently calculated to pronounce an opinion upon such a subject as this. It was true that Sir Joseph Hawley was not in favour of the scheme; but Sir Archibald Alison and General Napier had expressed strong opinions the other way, and the chief educational authorities in the country had supported their views. He believed that an almost unanimous welcome had been accorded to it—out-of-doors no one hardly ever heard a different opinion. Wherever he went he heard it stated that the training of young men as officers for the Army should not be so exclusively literary, but that they should have a sound physical training. He must acknowledge that the difficulty had been met in a fair and courteous and conciliatory spirit by the authorities and the War Office. His own conviction was that the adoption of the plan recommended by the Committee would have brought about a very great practical improvement upon the present system of training those young men; and therefore he deeply regretted that the authorities at the War Office should have deemed the difficulties insuperable.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE said, that it might be expected that he should say a few words on this interesting subject. He would say that he felt strongly with the noble Lords who had addressed the House; but he must honestly confess that when he came to the question of bringing the proposed system into practice, he found that it would be utterly impossible to do so—he did not himself see how it could be done; and two distinguished officers who signed the Report, being present when the question was further discussed, could not give any plan as to how their own recommendation could be carried out. If the recommendation should be adopted, it would change the whole present system of education, and changing the whole system was an extremely grave matter. How could they bring in marks for physical examination without its telling against the literary examination? They could not add to or diminish the marks without upsetting the system that now prevailed. There might be very good grounds for doing this; and possibly there might be found a system for combining the two things; but he and his noble Friend at the War Office, having given every consideration to the matter, he did not see how it was possible to combine the two things. There was one reason why they need be in no great hurry, and that was that there was not the slightest complaint to make with the existing state of things. The other day his representative, General Lysons, the Quartermaster General, went down to Sandhurst, and he said that he never saw a finer or a better set of young men than he saw there; young men better physically qualified or worthier to become officers in the Army had not presented themselves for some years. He himself also had been struck with the qualifications of the young men; and, therefore, he did not think that there was any necessity for making a change—unless, indeed, they could in some way combine the two systems of literary and physical competition. There were, however, already physical exercises at Sandhurst as well as at other places; so that the young officers had this advantage already. He himself thought it better that these advantages should be given at the large Schools and Colleges after the students entered those places. Before they entered them they might largely depend upon the means of their parents or guardians. He trusted that it would be understood that he did not in the least go against the Committee in their sentiments and desires to introduce into the Army efficient and physically competent young men; but he must say that he had no reason to doubt that they were now in the position of having very

VISCOUNT HARDINGE said, he must decline to believe, until more evidence to the contrary was shown, that the proposal of the Committee could not be carried out. It might be difficult but was not impossible; and he held emphatically in this matter that if there was a will there would be a way. Colonel Stanley, the Secretary of State for War, speaking in the House of Commons on this subject, said that the onus probandi rested on those who advocated the change of showing that the supply of young men for the Army with proper physical qualifications was insufficient; and the illustrious Duke the Commander-in-Chief was highly satisfied with the appearance of the young officers turned out under the present system; but it was really quite impossible to judge of a man's powers of endurance by his looks; it required the physical fatigues and dangers of a campaign to show what was in him. As to riding, he had been told on high authority that officers in India rode infamously, and as they came from Sandhurst the inference was that riding there was not, to say the least of it, what it should be. This, he understood, was the opinion of the illustrious Duke himself.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE said, he was not aware of having expressed any opinion of the kind. What he had said on the subject was that he should have liked to see more time devoted to riding than was the case; but he had found no fault with what at present existed. It was desirable, of course, that men should ride as well as possible.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE said, he had misunderstood the illustrious Duke. He certainly thought that the course of study at Sandhurst was not sufficient to enable a man to learn to ride well. If, however, a man had not had the opportunity of riding as a boy, there were other athletic exercises, such as walking or swimming, in which he might excel—so that it could not be said that the poor student would occupy a less favourable position than the rich. It was said that the advocates of this change wished secretly to undermine the principle of competitive examination; but the Committee in their Report studiously guarded themselves against that imputation. The intellectual boy, as they explained, would always be at the top; but when, coming down the list, they reached a low level of mediocrity, intellectual might, as they very reasonably suggested, be supplemented by physical acquirements. As to the medical examination, it was not by any means so strict as it might be. The candidates, he understood, only had their chests tapped and their legs examined for varicose veins; and some greater security than at present existed as to the physical capabilities of officers certainly seemed to him to be required.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL said, his noble Friend opposite (Viscount Hardinge) had done something to infuse a fresh vitality into a discussion which, after the crushing speech of the illustrious Duke, had appeared to have been extinguished. He first told their Lordships that if this method was not adopted the medical examination must be made more strict, and according to the noble Viscount's knowledge it was not strict enough. Then let them make it more strict if that were necessary, and they would entirely accomplish the object the Committee had in view. The noble Viscount had furnished them with another important fact, and had told them that it was impossible to know what the physical condition of an officer was until he had gone through an arduous campaign. Where was this arduous campaign to be held? Was it to be held at Aldershot or at Sandhurst? Surely he could not have it before the Committee, for they would eschew what was called by one of the principal advocates of the scheme the vulgarity of a public exhibition, and they would work it by some plan of a private competition, on some different and various methods which they had laid down. Then it was absolutely impossible to accomplish the object in the manner suggested by his noble Friend. That was exactly the thing which the illustrious Duke held out to their Lordships during the late Session. He said he would be delighted if there were such qualifications added; but he said it was a serious question on which he was not prepared to give an offhand opinion. The Secretary of State for War expressed very much the same opinion in the House of Commons. He (Viscount Cardwell) was not at all surprised at the opinion so decidedly expressed to-night by the illustrious Duke, or at the conclusion at which the War Office had arrived. It had been held that they now got the best officers. Sir John Ayde said so, and their Lordships had been told so by some of the best of the other witnesses whose testimony was given in the Appendix to the Report of the Committee. He recommended the whole of this evidence to the same careful consideration of their Lordships as it had received at the hands of the illustrious Duke and the authorities at the War Office; and he thought the more time they spent in investigating the subject the more they would arrive at the same conclusion which he was happy to hear Her Majesty's Government had come to.

LORD TEURO said, that upon the introduction of competitive examinations, not only in the War Department, but in the Civil Service Departments, they were somewhat overdone, and the same thing had happened in the Medical Service. For instance, in the Prerogative Court, a long correspondence took place when a man was wanted who could bring up a coal-scuttle. What was required in men was moral force of character, and the power of discrimination, so that they might be able to read the characters of others, and that alone would qualify men for command. While, on the one hand, it was most important that attention should be paid to the physical powers and bodily strength of these young men, yet it was by no means desirable to introduce competitive examinations for the purpose of obtaining the best men of that sort, and to abandon the system of mental and educational competition which now existed; but far more than all for consideration were the moral requirements of these young officers.

EARL FORTESCUE, in reply, said, that the proposal of the Committee was not that this competition should be compulsory, but that it should be voluntary. It would, therefore, only apply to a limited number of the candidates. There was no wish to interfere with the reward for superior intellectual merit. The object which he held should be sought and attained by the Government, and which was recommended by the Committee, was to give facilities for the selection of the best men "all round" among the intellectual mediocrities examined at the competitions for commissions. Far from denying the frequent concurrence in the same individual of bodily strength and activity with great intellectual power and application, he had himself called their Lordships' particular attention to the fact last year, and had then mentioned as a proof of it the habitual superiority at cricket and football of the Engineers, the most scientific of the scientific branches of the Army. He remained unsatisfied, as he was happy to find the noble Lord the Chairman of the Committee (Lord Hampton) was, of the absolute impracticability of the scheme, though he had no doubt of the difficulty of organizing it. He (Earl Fortescue) confessed, however, that he did not despair, considering the weight of authority which the Committee had elicited, and the general feeling in its favour out-of-doors, and above all its accordance with common sense, that sooner or later, like other improvements denounced in the first instance as impracticable and unnecessary, the scheme would in the course of a few years be adopted, and be found to work easily and satisfactorily.

THAMES RIVER (PREVENTION OF FLOODS) BILL (by Order.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he hoped he should be allowed to allude to a few of the circumstances which had induced the Metropolitan Board of Works to undertake to deal with this very important subject. He thought it would be in the remembrance of most hon. Members of that House that in the year 1874, in the months of March and April, and again in the year 1875, some very disastrous floods occurred in the Metropolis which did a vast amount of damage, and more especially to the poorer classes of the community. The Metropolitan Board being aware of this, and fearing that a like calamity might occur again, considered it incumbent upon them to try and do their best in order to provide some adequate remedy for the evil. Although they were in themselves the local authority, they had not in their own hands the power of inducing or making either the vestries, or district boards, or individuals raise the height of the river walls, or banks, or premises abutting upon the River Thames. They carefully considered the whole matter, and in the end took what they conceived to be the most proper course. Acting under Section 69 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, they addressed themselves to the various vestries and district boards, calling their attention to the disastrous effect of previous floods, and asking them, as far as was possible, to do everything in their power to aid the Metropolitan Board in their efforts to find a remedy. Some of the persons written to intimated that they would be ready to assist the Board; but others, in the replies which they sent to the Board, stated that although Section 69 of the Act of 1855 conferred certain powers upon them, still, in consequence of their not possessing the power of entry, they could do nothing more than write, as they had no power of enforcing the execution of any work.

in as a compromise, to go as he desired it to go, and he hoped the House would allow it to go, to a Private Bill Committee upstairs. Under all the circumstances of the case, he sincerely trusted that the House would consent to read the Bill a second time. He felt quite sure that the House would not allow a Bill of this important character, and dealing with such an important subject, to be thrown out of the House of Commons until it had received a full and fair hearing. At the proper time evidence would be tendered to the House in support of the provisions of the measure. Already the Bill had excited considerable attention in the Metropolis, and he was not surprised at it. He held in his hand a paper containing four or five pages of reasons against the Bill. When the proper time arrived, and he had the power of replying, he should reply to any objections which might be urged against the Bill. In the meantime, he asked the House to read the Bill a second time and refer it in the usual course to a Private Bill Committee. That course had already been taken in regard to a Bill introduced by the Corporation of the City of London. It was only this very week—namely, Tuesday last—that the Bill brought in by the Corporation for the improvement of Leadenhall Market was read a second time and referred to a Select Committee in the usual way. He, representing the Metropolitan Board, now asked the House of Commons to take the same course in regard to the present measure which had been accorded to the Bill brought in by the City of London—namely, to give the Bill a second reading, and insure for it a fair and just hearing before the tribunal of a Private Bill Committee. On behalf of the Metropolitan Board he asked for a Committee of Members who would all attend the inquiry and listen to all the evidence tendered to them on the matters they would be called upon to decide. He wished to avoid, if possible, taking a decision from a tribunal composed of Members who could not hear all the evidence, and only came in at the last moment to give a vote against the Bill, with their minds prepared beforehand. Without further comment, he asked the House to read the Bill a second time in order that it might go before a Select Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir James M'Garel-Hogg.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, who had upon the Paper a Notice to move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months, remarked that his hon. Friend the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg) had been illuminated by a flash of what Balzac used to call "retrospective perspicacity." He had found out this year what he ought to have found out a year ago, and had converted the measure into a Private Bill in order to get rid of opposition in its early stages. Unfortunately, he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was in the position of being hoist with his own petard, because he had suggested, when the Bill was before the House two years ago, that it should be brought in as a Private Bill. It seemed that his hon. Friend had this year followed the advice which was then rendered to him. With regard to the Bill itself, he wished to point out that his hon. Friend was, no doubt unintentionally, altogether misleading the House, when he wished them to believe that the Bill was only opposed by himself (Sir Charles W. Dilke) and a few hon. Members whose constituents were in some way interested in the matter. The great majority of his constituents were interested in the contrary way to the view which he took, so that he was perfectly unprejudiced in the matter. In point of fact, a similar Bill, but not exactly the same, was brought in two years ago, and referred, as his hon. Friend (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg) told them, to a Hybrid Committee. The hon. Baronet had that day laid great stress upon his desire, not only that the present Bill should be read a second time, but that it should be referred to a Private Bill Committee. In the last part of his speech the hon. Baronet four or five times over used those words. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) would say at once, from a fear of being misunderstood, and for reasons which he would give directly, that he should not divide against the second reading of the Bill. He should confine himself to giving a warm support to the Motion, which he had no doubt would be made by the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark (Colonel Beresford), after the Bill

Upon this, the Metropolitan Board had a careful survey made of the whole of the river banks. They caused notices to be sent to every one of the riparian owners, and they pointed out to all of them—whether they were large owners or only small owners—the disastrous effects which had been hitherto produced by the flooding of the river, and asked them to co-operate with the Metropolitan Board in doing everything in their power to remedy the evil in the future. About 1,000 notices, in round numbers, were sent out by the Metropolitan Board of Works; and he was glad to be able to tell the House that out of those 1,000 notices very nearly 600 had, up to the present time, complied with the requisition—or rather friendly notice—sent to them asking them to undertake the necessary works. Among the favourable replies received were many from the largest riparian owners—such as the wharfingers and the Railway Companies who had property bordering the river. It was not necessary that he should enter into this part of the question at greater length. All he would say was that the Metropolitan Board went as far as they could in the matter; but they found that still more remained to be done. They therefore introduced a Bill into Parliament in 1877. It gave rise to some discussion in the House of Commons, and was ultimately referred to a Hybrid Committee. That Committee passed a Resolution expressing an opinion that the charge ought to be distributed over the whole of the Metropolis. It was only right to say that, in the first place, a Motion was made in the Committee that the expenses should be halved; but it was lost by a majority of 2. The other Motion—that the cost should be distributed over the whole of the Metropolis—was carried, he thought, by a majority of 3—he was not quite sure whether it was 3 or 4. The Metropolitan Board wished, as far as possible, to consult the wishes of the Committee, without entirely ignoring their own views, or the views of the general inhabitants throughout the length and breadth of London—amounting to about 4,000,000, or perhaps to about 3,500,000, so far as the riverside property was concerned. Many persons were of opinion that they ought not to stir further in the matter; but in deference to the views of the Committee of the House of Commons, to which the Board thought all proper respect should be paid, the Metropolitan Board brought in and intrusted to his charge last Session a Bill in which provision was made that the works for the prevention of floods, whether upon property belonging to the district boards, to vestries, or to individuals, should be paid for by the people on the banks or the riparian owners, and that the compensation should be paid for entirely out of the general purse of the Metropolis. It appeared to him that that was a very fair mode of apportioning the expenses. That Bill was brought in by himself as Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works last year; but an hon. Friend of his who objected to it immediately gave Notice of opposition, taking the somewhat unusual course of trying to prevent the Bill from even being brought in. Fortunately, at the end of the Session, his hon. Friend went away, and then he managed to get the Bill introduced. He was unable, however, to get a second reading for it, the close of the Session being so near that it was perfectly hopeless to expect to pass it through the House. He therefore took what he considered to be a proper course, and withdrew the Bill, so that the opponents of the measure should not be put to unnecessary expense. He now came to the present year. The Metropolitan Board, still feeling it their duty to do all in their power to try and induce those with whom the liability rightly rested to raise the banks of the river in order to prevent the destruction of property by the flooding of the Thames, had again intrusted the Bill to his care. But this time he had brought in the Bill as a Private Bill, and he had taken this course expressly to provide that the Bill being a Private Bill should come before the House, and that the House should give a decision upon the matter. All he could say was that if the decision of a Select Committee or of the House were adverse to the proposals now made by the Metropolitan Board of Works, the Board would not be prepared to accept the responsibility of any future floods. If the House came to the conclusion that it was not right to pass the Bill, the responsibility would certainly be taken off his shoulders and would rest upon those who would not allow such a Bill, brought to proceed with the Motion of which he had given Notice, he did not think it was necessary to take up much further the time of the House in considering the matter. The observations which had just been made by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea were exceedingly moderate. He had expressed the views of those who considered themselves somewhat aggrieved by the course taken by the Metropolitan Board of Works in promoting the Bill this year in its present form. The House had heard from the two hon. Members who had already spoken what the object of the Bill was. The House were also aware that a Bill similar to the present one was introduced two years ago by the Metropolitan Board of Works, and that upon that occasion it was referred to a Hybrid Committee. That Committee, which was presided over by the hon. Member for Elgin, took a great deal of evidence upon the whole question, and the result of their labours was very largely to modify the character of the Bill. The Metropolitan Board of Works, being dissatisfied with the finding of the Committee, ultimately withdrew the Bill. In the course of last year the Bill was introduced again as a Public Bill; but as it did not comply with the requirements of the Committee, opposition was offered to it in its earliest stage. This year, the hon. Baronet the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg) had taken care to introduce the Bill as a Private Bill, and not as a Public Bill, and had therefore secured for it a discussion on a very early day. Objection, however, had been taken in some quarters to that course. A Petition had been presented by the Lambeth Vestry, who were largely affected by the Bill, and who stated in it that they represented the opinion, not merely of Lambeth, but of Fulham and other parts of the district. They objected to the Bill being treated as a Private Bill, because they were of opinion that it came under Standing Order 194, which required that all Bills promoted by the Metropolitan Board of Works, which proposed to raise money, should be treated as Public Bills. He thought that the view taken by the Petitioners was a mistake in this particular instance; because, although the Bill brought in last Session did contain borrowing powers, the Bill brought in this Session did not contain such borrowing powers. All the financial portion of the Bill was confined to temporary advances by the Metropolitan Board of Works to persons who might require aid in carrying out the works necessary for raising the river banks. It did not in any way require any permanent advance to be made, and it made no addition to the debt of the Metropolitan Board of Works. Therefore, he thought the Bill stood clear of the objection which was taken to it under the Standing Orders, and was properly entitled to be introduced into the House as a Private Bill. Having said so much in justification of the course taken by his hon. Friend the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg) in introducing the Bill in that form, he felt bound, at the same time, to point out that his hon. Friend could not object to the Bill being treated as part of a public question, inasmuch as the Metropolitan Board themselves had twice endeavoured to deal with it as a Public Bill. It was not open, therefore, to the Metropolitan Board to object to any course taken by the House in referring the Bill to a Hybrid Committee, because in this particular instance it happened to make its appearance on the Paper in the shape of a Private Bill. He did not wish at this stage of the Bill to go into questions pro and con that were likely to be raised before a Committee upstairs. The House would probably be aware that the main issue to be tried was whether the incidence of the taxation for the purpose of protecting the river banks from floods was to fall mainly upon the river population, or was to be spread over the larger area of the Metropolis generally? That was a very large and important question, and was one that was gone into by the Committee of 1877. He thought the Motion which had been placed on the Paper by the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark (Colonel Beresford) appeared to be well calculated to meet the difficulties of the case, and, with the permission of the House, he would for a moment call attention to it. The hon. and gallant Member proposed that the Bill be committed "To a Select Committee of Eleven Members; and that the Report of the Select Committee of 1877 be referred to the said Committee; that all Petitions against the Bill be referred to the Committee, and that such Petitioners as pray to be heard by them-should have been read a second time, that it be referred to a Hybrid Committee of the House. He thought it ought to be referred to a Committee which was not simply a Private Bill Committee, but a Hybrid Committee, which was a larger Committee, and one nominated partly by the House and partly by the Committee of Selection. Such a Committee would be a perfectly impartial Committee, and he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary (Mr. Assheton Cross), whom he saw in his place, would support that proposition. The right hon. Gentleman had taken great interest in the subject in the past; and perhaps it might not be known to hon. Members of the House, who did not follow Metropolitan questions, that the right hon. Gentleman had over and over again corresponded with the Metropolitan Board of Works, and pointed out the obstinacy of a small majority of the Board in regard to this question. If the right hon. Gentleman supported the reference of the Bill to a Hybrid Committee instead of to a Private Bill Committee, he would be only following out the course which he had previously taken in the matter. He had not succeeded in gathering from his hon. Friend the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg) whether he intended to agree to the Motion for referring the Bill to a Hybrid Committee or not. If his hon. Friend did, then he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had nothing more to say. As he had already said, he should not oppose the second reading. If, on the other hand, his hon. Friend would not agree to the proposal to refer the Bill to a Hybrid Committee, but persisted in referring it to a Private Bill Committee, then he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) would state briefly why he had thought it wise to place upon the Paper a Motion against the second reading of the Bill, but why he should not divide the House upon that Motion. He should not move the rejection of the Bill, because he did not wish in any way to seem to prevent legislation. On the other hand, he did consider that it would be useless for the House to pass a Bill of this kind, when they knew perfectly well that the great majority of impartial witnesses who looked into the matter two years ago came strongly to the conclusion that the Bill ought to be cast in a wholly different form. Then, again, it must be borne in mind that the House had no security whatever, if the Committee this year took the same view as that which was taken by the Committee two years ago, that his hon. Friend the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board would not immediately drop the Bill, as he did before. If the Committee altered the Bill in order to make it acceptable to the House, then he feared that his hon. Friend would drop the Bill, and the great expense the different localities would have been put to in opposing the Bill would be entirely lost, and they would have to come before Parliament again. The House knew very well that it would be impossible to pass any Bill that would not entail a considerable expense, and it was for that reason he had placed a Notice against the Bill upon the Paper. At the same time, he felt that if he divided against the second reading his motives might be misunderstood. Therefore, while his opinions remained really unchanged, he felt that he could not take upon himself the responsibility of dividing against the Bill. He might add that he had taken the trouble to find out whether it was possible for the House, if the Bill was altered by the Committee, and the Committee this year took the same view of the matter as the Committee took two years ago—if it would be possible for the House to carry on the Bill in the event of its being dropped by the Board of Works, and for some Member of the Committee to take charge of it, even if the hon. Baronet dropped it. One of the reasons which weighed with him (Sir Charles W. Dilke), in deciding not to divide upon the second reading, was the belief that there was one precedent for this course. He believed it would be possible, although it was not often done, for the Chairman of the Committee, or some other Member of it, to go on with the Bill, even if the Metropolitan Board retired from it. If he were right, as he believed he was, in thinking there was a precedent for this course, then, whatever his views were in regard to the Bill as it stood, he would allow it to be read a second time, in the hope that it would then be referred to a Hybrid Committee.

Mr. RAIKES observed, that as the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) did not propose

of Works. He would not detain the House further. He entirely agreed, as far as the formation of the Committee was concerned, with every word that had fallen from the Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Raikes). He should like to add one word more, and it was this. It was a matter of vital importance, and almost essential to the well-being of the inhabitants of London, that the question should be settled. It was absolutely necessary, for the protection of the life and health of the people in the low-lying districts bordering the Thames, that the matter should be at once taken in hand. Therefore, he hoped the House would fairly understand that if the Bill was considered by a Hybrid Committee upstairs, and they came to a decision upon it, whatever that decision might be, when the Committee had arrived at a decision, the House would, at all events, insist on the Bill being gone on with and passed into law. With these few observations, he trusted that the House would read the Bill a second time, and at once proceed to the consideration of the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark (Colonel Beresford), modified as suggested by his hon. Friend the Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Raikes).

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that as it appeared probable the Bill would be referred to a Committee, he wished to express a hope that the Members appointed upon the Committee would have no interest in the questions to be considered. The last Committee appointed in 1877 consisted of 10 Members, and five of them had a direct interest in the question in one way or the other. He did not think it proper that a question of this importance should be referred to a Committee largely composed of those who had a direct interest in the question.

COLONEL BERESFORD intimated that he entirely fell in with the views which had been expressed by the Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Raikes).

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG thought he might, perhaps, be allowed to say that, having brought the Bill in, having heard the views expressed by hon. Members who had taken part in the debate, and being very unwilling on all occasions to take up unnecessary time in a fruitless discussion, he would be very happy to accept the suggestion of the Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Raikes). He was quite ready to accept the proposal of the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark (Colonel Beresford) to refer the Bill to a Hybrid Committee; but, under all the circumstances of the case, he hoped the Chairman of Ways and Means would not object to an addition to the Motion, requiring that all Petitions against the Bill should be presented on or before the 6th of March. He believed that his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Southwark was perfectly willing to accept an Amendment to that effect; and it was a matter of great convenience, as well as of importance, that, in regard to a Bill of this kind, all Petitions against it should be deposited early. It would be hardly fair to those who took a great interest in the matter that any lengthened period should be allowed for the presentation of Petitions. He hoped that his hon. Friend the Chairman of Ways and Means would have no objection to this suggestion, and on that understanding he would propose to amend the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark, by inserting after the word "Petitions" in the fourth line, the words "presented against the Bill be presented before the 6th of March." If that were done, he should be quite ready to accept the Motion. He might add, in conclusion, that as far as he had any influence as Chairman of the Metropolitan Board, he would take care and use that influence to insure that, whatever decision was come to by the Committee, should be thoroughly and entirely acquiesced in. He would certainly do his best to see that the views of the Committee were carried out, because he thought the time had now arrived when something should be done to prevent the terrible calamities which resulted from the overflowing of the river.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA was glad that the hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works was ready to come to an understanding in regard to the decision of the Committee; but he objected to the proposal to curtail the period allowed for the presentation of Petitions against the Bill. Ten days after the second reading of a Bill was the usual time allowed to anyone who had a locus standi against a Private Bill to enter an opposition. Even ten days was a very short time; selves, their Counsel, or Agents, be heard upon their Petitions if they think fit, and Counsel heard in favour of the Bill against such Petitioners. That the Committee have powers to alter and modify the Bill as regards the incidence of taxation for the works proposed to be authorised by the Bill."

Perhaps it would not be out of place to refer the House to the instruction given to the Committee of 1877. That Committee consisted also of 11 Members, six of whom were nominated by the House and the remainder by the Committee of Selection. The instruction given to them was that they should have power to inquire into and report upon the most equitable mode of charging and meeting the expenses to be incurred under the Bill. It would be seen, therefore, that the Motion about to be proposed by the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark (Colonel Beresford) would have practically the same effect as the instruction given to the Committee of 1877, and the Committee to whom this Bill might be referred would have the additional advantage of being enlightened by the Report of that Committee. The Committee themselves took more than ordinary pains in investigating the question, and arrived at a clear decision in regard to it. But the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark did not, he (Mr. Raikes) thought, fully grasp the importance of dealing with the matter by a Hybrid Committee. He had put his Resolution, perhaps very excusably, from a want of acquaintance with the technical Forms of the House, in a shape that would imply there should be a Public Committee. Now, that he (Mr. Raikes) did not think would be a desirable course. They all knew that the attendance of hon. Members on a Public Committee was not as regular as that which was secured on a Private Bill Committee, and it was exceedingly desirable that the tribunal to whom this Bill was to be referred should be one that should sit upon it as far as possible de die in diem. They might, he thought, expect more from a Hybrid Committee than from an ordinary Select Committee. Of course, hon. Members were aware that, in appointing a Select Committee on an occasion of this sort, they expected the Committee more to hear evidence than to enter into the general question; and it was almost impossible to appoint Members upon the Committee who would give the daily attendance which was obtained from a Committee nominated by the Committee of Selection. He would, therefore, suggest to the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark that he should so far modify his proposal, when it came before the House, as to make his reference one to a Hybrid Committee, and not to a Select Committee. He ventured to think, after the statements which had now been made to the House, that the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark might, without much further discussion, find himself in a position to agree to that Motion; and if he did, it should be with a thorough understanding with the Metropolitan Board of Works that, if the Bill was to be read a second time and then referred to a Hybrid Committee, in the event of the Committee coming to a decision which they did not like, the House of Commons should not be treated in the same manner as they had been treated before by the Metropolitan Board of Works. It should be understood that if any change in the provisions of the Bill, however important, was arrived at as the deliberate conclusion of the Committee, it should be accepted by the Metropolitan Board. The House would certainly expect that that course would be taken, and that they should not be called upon again to sanction an inquiry which the Metropolitan Board would decline to accept. He hoped the Bill would now be read a second time, so that the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark might have an opportunity of submitting his proposition to the House.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS was anxious to say a word or two, as his name had been mentioned by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke). For some time he had taken considerable interest in this question, and he thought it would be unwise for the House to reject the second reading of the Bill. The matter was one that required the immediate attention of Parliament; but after the Report of the Committee of 1877, he did not think they ought to read the Bill a second time without coming to a clear understanding that, in the first place, it should be carefully considered by a Committee upstairs, and, in his opinion, by a Hybrid Committee instead of an ordinary Private Bill Committee, and that the conclusion arrived at by the Committee should be acquiesced in by the Metropolitan Board of Works. He would not detain the House further. He entirely agreed, as far as the formation of the Committee was concerned, with every word that had fallen from the Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Raikes). He should like to add one word more, and it was this. It was a matter of vital importance, and almost essential to the well-being of the inhabitants of London, that the question should be settled. but in this case the hon. Baronet wished to shorten it, and proposed the 6th of March—which would only allow six days, one of them being a Sunday. He thought, when the Bill had passed a second reading, that they should not encumber it with any such proposition. He would expect the time for entering opposition to be extended.

COLONEL BERESFORD moved—

"That the Bill be committed to a Select Committee of Eleven Members, and that the Report of the Select Committee of 1877 be referred to the said Committee:—That all Petitions against the Bill be referred to the Committee, and that such Petitioners as pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents, be heard upon their Petitions, if they think fit, and Counsel heard in favour of the Bill against such Petitioners:—That the Committee have power to alter and modify the Bill as regards the incidence of taxation for the works proposed to be authorized by the Bill."

He had no objection to the proposal of his hon. Friend (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg), that all Petitions against the Bill should be presented on or before the 8th of March.

MR. SPEAKER: I wish to point out to the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark that when a Committee of this character is appointed it is usual to state how many are to be appointed by the House and how many by the Committee of Selection.

COLONEL BERESFORD proposed that six should be appointed by the House, and five by the Committee of Selection.

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG asked if this was the proper time to move his Amendment?

MR. SPEAKER: It will come afterwards.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Bill be committed to a Select Committee of Eleven Members, Six to be appointed by the House, and Five by the Committee of Selection, and that the Report of the Select Committee of 1877 be referred to the said Committee:—That all Petitions against the Bill be referred to the Committee, and that such Petitioners as pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents, be heard upon their Petitions, if they think fit, and Counsel heard in favour of the Bill against such Petitioners:—That the Committee have power to alter and modify the Bill as regards the incidence of taxation for the works proposed to be authorized by the Bill."

Sir Joseph M'Kenna

MR. RAIKES was glad that the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark had adopted the suggestion made to him as to making the Committee a Hybrid Committee, and agreeing that six Members should be nominated by the House and the remaining five by the Committee of Selection. The Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works had pleaded for a somewhat shorter time than usual for Petitions to be lodged against the Bill, and had suggested the 6th of March. He understood that there would be no objection to accept the 8th of March, and he thought that would be a solution of the difficulty which the House would accede to. It gave a clear week from to-morrow for Petitions to be sent in; and it must be borne in mind that, in promoting the Bill, the Metropolitan Board of Works were acting as a public body in the performance of a public duty, and that it was not desirable to give extended facilities, which would only result in adding to their trouble and expense. It was desirable that a day should be named beyond which Petitions should not be allowed to be deposited, and he did not think that the 8th of March would be either too late or too early a day. He thought if the hon. Baronet would make this proposition, the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark would accede to it.

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG then moved his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In line 5, after the word "Bill," to insert the words "presented on or before the 8th day of March."—(Sir James M'Garel-Hogg.)

COLONEL BERESFORD expressed his willingness to accept the Amendment.

Ordered, That the Bill be committed to a Select Committee of Eleven Members, Six to be appointed by the House and Five by the Committee of Selection, and that the Report of the Select Committee of 1877 be referred to the said Committee:—That all Petitions against the Bill presented on or before the 8th day of March be referred to the Committee, and that such Petitioners as pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents, be heard upon their Petitions, if they think fit, and Counsel heard in favour of the Bill against such Petitioners:—That the Committee have power to alter and modify the Bill as regards the incidence of taxation for the works proposed to be authorized by the Bill.

REPRESENTATION OF THE CITY— THE FANMAKERS COMPANY.

QUESTION.

MR. W. H. JAMES asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the proceedings of the Court of Aldermen on the 18th instant, when that Court authorised the sale through the Fanmakers' Company to one hundred and forty persons the right for life to vote for the representation of the City of London at the price of £15 for each such right to vote; and, whether, considering that the number of residents within the City has of late years largely diminished, and that the number of liverymen already amounts to 6,720 persons, he will take steps to abolish this sale of the franchise for political purposes?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I am told that in 1809 the Fanmakers' Company petitioned the Court of Aldermen to be created a livery company, and after consideration that petition was granted, and it was then provided that the number of the livery should not exceed 60, and that the fine for admission was to be £15 a-piece. The Fanmakers' Company, I am told, have recently exhibited great activity in connection with the "mystery of fanmaking;" and it became necessary, in consequence of the number of applications for admission, either to refuse applicants or to apply to the Court of Aldermen, according to the ancient custom, to increase the number of the livery. This application was made by a memorial to the Court of Aldermen, and they agreed that the number of the livery should be increased to 200—that is, an increase of 140. I suppose they were within their right in doing that, and I am told there is no reason to suppose that this was done for political purposes. Further than that I have no answer to make.

MR. W. H. JAMES pointed out that the right hon. Gentleman had not said whether he intended to take any steps in the matter.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I said that further than that I have no answer to give.

IRELAND—REPORT OF THE POOR LAW AND LUNACY COMMISSIONERS.

QUESTION.

MR. FRENCH asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he can inform the House when the Report of the Poor Law and Lunacy Commissioners (Ireland), presented on the 14th February, is likely to be in the hands of Members?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, with regard to the Report of the Poor Law and Lunacy Commissioners, I find that it is a lengthy document, and though a copy of it is, I understand, available for reference, some days will elapse—perhaps a fortnight—before it can be generally circulated; but the utmost despatch will be observed in getting it ready.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR— FURTHER DESPATCHES. — QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Colonies will be able to state to the House, Whether the Government have received any further telegrams from Madeira in addition to that which has been published as having been addressed to the War Office?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH: Sir, the only further telegram I have received is one from Sir Henry Bulwer, giving the names of officers and men of the Colonial and European Forces ascertained to have been killed at Isandula. It contains 58 names. The only commissioned officers named in it are Lieutenant Scott, Quartermaster London, Quartermaster-Sergeant Bullock, Captain Wrottlesly, Captain Bradstreet, and Quartermaster Hitchcock, of the Newcastle Mounted Rifles. I will take care that the full list shall at once be published in the newspapers.

INDIAN FINANCE—THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA ACT, 1858.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. FAWCETT, in rising to call attention to the inadequate control now exercised over the expenditure of the Revenues of India, and to move—

said, that so far as he was concerned, he believed that what he was about to say might just as well be spoken by any hon. Member on the other side of the House as by one who sat on the Liberal Benches. He rejoiced, too, that his Motion was to be seconded by one who held a high position on the other side of the House. He referred to his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), who was the only survivor on the other side of the House of that famous Committee which sat in 1853 on the affairs of the Government of India, and of which the late Mr. Thomas Baring was the Chairman. On his own side of the House, the only survivors of that Committee were the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe). In order to justify the Motion which he had placed on the Paper, it would be necessary to show, in the first place, that the financial condition of India at the present moment was not satisfactory, and that this was due to inadequate control; and then to prove that such an inquiry as he suggested was likely to bring about the desired result. During the last few years a great change had come over the feeling in this country with which questions relating to India were regarded. Opinions which were now generally accepted were five years ago regarded as simply the unreasoning conclusions of a pessimist. The cardinal propositions which he had to submit to the House he would range under six heads. He should show, in the first place, that the net Revenue, or the real available Revenue, of India was less than £38,000,000; secondly, that the Expenditure of that country was increasing more rapidly than its Revenue; thirdly, that the ordinary Revenue was only barely sufficient to meet the ordinary Expenditure, and that, therefore, nothing was left to meet the contingencies of war or of famine; fourthly, that all available sources of taxation were nearly exhausted, and that, therefore, additional expenditure had to be met by increased borrowing; that was also the case with the money spent on Public Works, and the result was that the Debt of the country had steadily and rapidly increased, having doubled within the last 20 years; fifthly, that the Military Expenditure of the country was enormous, and had rapidly increased since the amalgamation of the two Armies, until they were met by the alarming fact that it absorbed about 45 per cent of the entire net Revenue; and, sixthly, that there was an increasing charge upon the Revenue arising out of the loss by exchange, which was perpetually being aggravated by the increase in the Home Charges, which diminished the demand for silver in the East. These six propositions, he submitted, correctly described the financial position of India at the present moment. If the accuracy of any one of these propositions was disputed, he would refer to a fact stated in an announcement which was lately made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that a loan of £2,000,000 to India, without interest, would be proposed in aid of the expenses of the war in Afghanistan. Now, if India was not legally responsible for the expenses of that war, she ought not to be made to pay them; and if she was so responsible, as the Government said she was, then would not the proposal of such a loan, without interest, to India, be little less than a proclamation of the insolvency of the finances of that country. The Expenditure in India had been steadily increasing, and the control over the Expenditure was inadequate. If it was the fact that the financial condition of India was capable of no improvement, it simply showed that they could not financially govern India; that there was nothing before them but bankruptcy; and that the sooner they wound up the concern the better. But, for his own part, he took no such despairing view of the outlook. He believed it was possible for the House to secure a wiser and better administration of the finances of India, which would cause her resources to be more rapidly developed, and place the finances on a secure and sound basis. When, some 23 years ago, it was proposed to transfer the government of India from the Company to the Crown, there was a certain enthusiasm of public opinion in favour of the abolition of the Company; and, as was so often the case, they rushed precipitately to a conclusion. The merits of the Company were ignored, and its defects prominently brought forward. It was forgotten that the Company provided real and efficient guarantees for economical administration, and that the safeguards which were to be substituted for them were likely to prove, as they had proved, comparatively inefficient. A distinguished and experienced authority, who had served in India in the day of the Company, and also after the transfer—Sir Charles Trevelyan—comparing the government of India under the Company with its government under the Crown, said that the financial administration under the former was “frugal, independent, and resistant to exacting external pressure;” whereas, under the latter, it had been profuse and squeezable. The old East India Company was one of the most powerful Corporations in the world. Its influence was felt in every county and every borough in England. It had great influence in this House, and associated with it was a body having a direct personal interest in the economical administration of the finances of India. If any charge was thrown improperly on India, the old Directors in this House, and the powerful proprietary out-of-doors, would offer an effectual opposition to such a proceeding. The result of that system was that the administration was frugal. The only contention was whether that frugality had not been carried to the length of parsimony. It would be well for India if there were a little of that frugality or parsimony now. When the Company was abolished, both political Parties felt it necessary, if possible, to impose some financial check on the Secretary of State similar to that which had been imposed by the Court of Directors on the President of the Board of Control. The Council of the Secretary of State was accordingly constituted, because it was felt if the Secretary of State was to act alone, and being simply a Member of the English Government, that the financial interests of India would be perpetually sacrificed to the exigencies of English political life. The greatest possible pains were taken, therefore, to give authority and power to the Council. Its members were at first appointed for life, and held their offices on the same tenure as those of the English Judges. That they might be cut off from political influence, they were not permitted to sit in this House. In 1869, however, an Act was passed essentially changing the position of the Council. No longer were the offices of its members to be permanent. They were to be appointed by the Secretary of State; but they were only to hold their offices for 10 years, and at the end of that term they were to be re-appointed by the Secretary of State if he so willed it. It was obvious how important was the change which was thus introduced. If the object of the Council was simply to advise the Secretary of State, there might be good reason for providing for the frequent flow of promotion; but if the object of the Council was to exercise financial control over the Secretary of State, it was of the first importance that they should be made as independent as possible, and so placed that they need not care whether they pleased or displeased the Secretary of State, provided they did their duty. Now, nothing was further from his intention than to bring any charge against the members of the Indian Council. It was impossible, without further inquiry, for any fair-minded man to arrive at a conclusion whether the inadequacy of the financial control lately exercised was due to the Council not having sufficient power, or to its members not making sufficient use of the power intrusted to them. The Council had no power of initiation. They could not bring forward any motion on which they wished to express an opinion, or raise any discussion on any subject on which they desired to offer advice. All they could do was to express their opinion on subjects brought under their notice by the Secretary of State. Under the old system, on the other hand, every despatch had to be submitted to the Directors of the Company, and even secret despatches had to be submitted to the secret committee of the Directors, consisting of the Chairman, Deputy Chairman, and the senior Director of the Company, and,

according to the evidence given by Lord Ellenborough before the Committee of 1853, the secret committee of Directors had a right to comment on those despatches, and their comments were brought under the notice of the Cabinet. Thus there was a most important check upon the Secretary of State. At the present time, there was no power of remonstrance on the part of the Council; it was left solely to the Secretary of State to determine what subjects should, or should not, be considered in the secret department. The second great point of difference between the new and old system was this. If, at the present time, a charge were thrown illegally on the Revenues of India, there was no one possessing a legal status to resist the charge; whereas, in the days of the Company, the Directors had a legal status in the Queen's Bench, so that the matter could be tried, as a question of strict law, by the highest Court in the Realm. The third point of difference was, that if a Bill were brought forward in that House affecting India, there was now no security that it would be submitted to or ever considered by the Council, or by any independent body connected with India. Formerly, not only could the members of the Company who sat in that House watch the progress of Bills, but the Company, the Court of Proprietors, or the Directors could be heard at the Bar of the House in opposition to any measure they disapproved. At the present time, the Council was deprived of all powers of controlling subjects of policy; but, under the old régime, such was the power of the directors in such matters that, in one memorable instance, the Court of Directors recalled a Governor General because they objected to his policy. Further, if any charge were improperly thrown on the Revenues of India, it was uncertain whether the Council would resist it, and, if they did so, they would have no means of bringing the influence of public opinion to bear on behalf of India; but formerly the Directors of the Company could secure a public discussion through the Court of Proprietors, and the people who were interested had then an opportunity of coming to the rescue; but under the new system all such means of control had passed away. This description of the differences between the old and the present systems of governing India was sufficient to show how weak were the existing guarantees for economy and good administration, as compared with those which existed before the government of India was transferred to the Crown. As to the inadequacy of the financial control, he was prepared to bring forward certain specific facts in illustration of that, which, he thought, could not be gainsaid. Some years ago, a table was issued from the Department of the Controller of the Finances of India, showing the cost of administration under the old and the present systems. In 1856, two years before the abolition of the Company, the cost of administering India—excluding the Army and Public Works Expenditure—was £14,900,000. In 15 years from that time the cost had advanced to £23,200,000, or, in other words, there had been an increase of more than 60 per cent. This increase had continued up to the present time. The cost of stationery and printing in 1856 was £120,000; in 1870-71 it was £230,000; and in 1876-7, it was £440,000, being an increase of nearly 400 per cent. The cost of the Medical Service in 1856 was £170,000; in 1870-71 it was £520,000; and in 1876-7 it was £590,000. The charge for interest in 1856 was £2,200,000; in 1870-71 it was £3,200,000; and in 1876-7 it was £4,400,000. He believed it could be shown that no inconsiderable portion of this remarkable increase in all the items of administration was due to extravagance; but, assuming that not a shilling of the money had been wasted, the matter was not less serious, for they were distinctly living beyond their income, and so long as they continued doing so their embarrassment must increase, till their position in India would become one of hopeless insolvency. He wished now to direct attention to the exact nature of the financial control which had been exercised during the period to which he had referred, when the cost of administration, excluding Army and Public Works Expenditure, had increased by 60 per cent. They were told that the Council was to exercise a supreme financial control. Official Returns in the Appendix to a Blue Book enabled him to give the House a considerable amount of information concerning the financial control of the Council. In directing attention to these facts, he desired to make no charge whatever against the Council, for it was impossible to say that the fact of their not having exercised control was not due to defects in the Act which they were called upon to administer. In numerous instances, he believed, it would be found that it was of little use for the Council to resist because items of expenditure were not brought under their consideration until the outlay had been actually incurred, and all they had to do was to sanction the expenditure after the money had been paid. In the period to which he had referred, the work of dissent was done by an extremely small minority of the Council. He would consider some of the acts of extravagance which during that period were sanctioned, or at least unchallenged by dissent. The Elphinstone Land Company, whose shares were at 330 rupees, the Indian Government bought for 1,000 rupees a-share. The manager of that Company was a member of the firm of Fleming, Nicol and Co., of Glasgow Bank-notoriety, and if the secret history of the purchase ever became known, he believed extraordinary disclosures would be made. In any case, no one could deny that £1,000,000 of the money of the Indian people was sacrificed in that transaction. The Orissa Works, which could not be sold in London for £600,000, were purchased for £1,000,000, and £70,000, in addition, was distributed among the officials of the Company during the period referred to. £11,000,000 had been wasted on barracks. The household expenses of the Governor of Bombay were also enormously increased, and it would be easy to cite numerous other instances of reckless extravagance. Since the Act of 1858 was passed a great event, so far as India was concerned, had happened. This event was not expected, and therefore it could not be provided for in the Act of 1858. When that Act was passed India had an Army of her own, and she controlled the large item of her Military Expenditure. Since then the two Armies had been amalgamated, and charge after charge and change after change had been made without a single thought being given as to what the effect on India would be, and without the Indian authorities being consulted. For instance, the pay of the English soldier had been raised 2*d.* a-day, entailing an additional charge of £250,000 a-year on India.

The short-service system had been established, which, although it might be a good thing for England, was the most costly system that could be devised for India. But, whether for good or ill, there was no official record to show that a single person connected with the Government of India had been consulted before these changes were made. All the best Indian authorities were opposed to short service, and Lord Canning, who was then Viceroy, protested against it. The change, however, was carried out in the most high-handed manner. The subject was never even mentioned to the Council of the Secretary of State for India until the Secretary came down and said—"Gentlemen, it is no use protesting; your protest will be simply waste paper. The matter has been already decided by the English Cabinet." Yet this change had thrown a charge of £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 a-year on India, and, more than anything else, had led to her financial embarrassment. He had reserved to the last the strongest possible argument which he could advance in support of his Resolution—namely, that the Act of 1858 and the subsequent Acts relating to the Government of India had been so worded that the highest Ministerial and legal authorities differed diametrically as to the meaning and intent of the Statutes. The result was that the law was uncertain, that to a great extent it was disregarded, and that it was concentrated in the hands of the Secretary of State. He would prove it by reference to a remarkable debate on the Bill of 1869, which made the tenure of office by the Council of the Secretary of State no longer permanent. When the Bill was passing through the House of Lords there was a most remarkable debate; he referred to it for no Party purpose, for he agreed with the opinions then expressed by Lord Cairns and Lord Salisbury, and disagreed with those expressed on the other side. Lord Salisbury, ex-Secretary of State, laid down this doctrine in the plainest manner—that by the letter and spirit of the Act of 1858 the Council of the Secretary of State had been intrusted with supreme control, not only on questions purely of expenditure, but upon almost all questions of policy, because there was no question of policy which did not sooner or later involve the question of expense. Lord Salisbury compared the financial control of the Council with the control of the House of Commons over the Expenditure of England. This interpretation of the Act of 1858 was endorsed by Lord Cairns and Lord Chelmsford; but Lord Hatherley, who was then Lord Chancellor, said that no Court of Law would for a moment support the construction put upon the Act by Lord Cairns. If Lord Chancellors and ex-Lord Chancellors, Secretaries of State and ex-Secretaries of State differed diametrically as to the meaning of an Act by which 250,000,000 of people were governed, could it need any words to show that inquiry was necessary and that the time had come when the Act of 1858 ought to be put upon a certain and intelligible basis? Lord Lyveden, who was President of the Board of Control when the first Indian Act of 1858 was introduced, said that the Court of Directors had successfully resisted the whole of the charge for the Persian War being thrown on the Revenues of India, and half the charge was thrown on England; and he added it was felt at the time that if the control of the Board of Directors was abolished it would be absolutely necessary to give similar control to some other body. Therefore this Act was passed. But he believed the Council had not been so much as consulted as to what portion of the expense of the Afghan Campaign should be borne by India. In the same debate, in answer to the Duke of Argyll, Lord Cairns made the remarkable declaration that, even if Russia were to invade Afghanistan, the consent of the Council must be obtained before war was declared against Russia. But such was the uncertainty of the law that Lord Cairns was a Member of the Government which 10 years later invaded Afghanistan, and not only did not obtain the consent of the Council, but, as they knew from the Ministerial answer given in that House, did not even consult it. He knew that members of the Council were as anxious as men could be to have an opportunity of recording their opinions. So great was the uncertainty of the law that the authority and control of the Council were being gradually frittered away. He knew members of the Council who, if this Committee were granted, would come forward and boldly say, rather than such a state of things should continue, it would be better the Council of the Secretary of State should be abolished. If they wanted to get at the opinion of these 15 men of great Indian experience, as in November last, it was felt to be a great misfortune that the members of the Council could not be consulted. They could only learn indirectly what their opinions were. The two most important clauses in the Act were the 54th and 55th, which declared that if India engaged in war the fact must be announced within one month if Parliament was sitting, and within three months if Parliament was not sitting, and that the Revenues of India could not be employed beyond the Frontiers of India without the consent of Parliament; but scarcely any two lawyers agreed as to the extent to which these two clauses controlled each other. The facts he had brought forward showed that the Act of 1858 urgently needed amendment. The rule in matters of importance and difficulty was that legislation should be preceded by inquiry. In the days of the Company the Charter used to be renewed for only 20 years, and at each interval there was an inquiry into the government of India. Among the many labours to which they could look back with pride there was nothing they could refer to with greater satisfaction than the records of the Committees which sat on the Government of India in 1808, 1832, and 1853. On each of these Committees there sat most eminent men. On that of 1808 Lord Castlereagh, Mr. Tierney, Mr. Wilberforce, and the Duke of Wellington sat. On that of 1832 were Mr. Robert Grant, Mr. Charles Grant, Sir George Grey, and almost every man of eminence in the House. On the Committee of 1853 were Mr. Macaulay, Mr. Cobden, Mr. Hume, Lord John Russell, Lord Palmerston, and others most familiar with the subject. These were precedents for such a Committee as he now asked for. But, it might be objected, the time was unsuitable. Why? Because it was said they were on the eve of a Dissolution. But the most important of the three Committees to which he had referred—that of 1832—sat in the Session when the Reform Bill was passed and when a Dissolution was certain in the autumn. That Committee took most exhaustive evidence and made a most memorable and able Report. Why should a Committee not sit in 1879?

Mr. Fawcett

Another reason why there should be no delay with regard to this inquiry was that no evidence could be more important than that of Lord Lawrence, Sir Charles Trevelyan, and others who had filled important official positions both under the old and new systems. But Lord Lawrence was advancing in years, and, except Lord Northbrook, he was the only survivor of the illustrious men who had filled the office of Viceroy, and was the only Viceroy who had held an official position before the East India Company was abolished, and the loss of his views, founded on his vast knowledge and experience, would be irreparable. No dispassionate person would deny that the financial position of India at present was unsatisfactory; and that if things were permitted to go on a financial embarrassment would soon arise which would not only put a severe strain on our resources, but would cause taxation to be imposed on the people, which they would regard as an intolerable burden, and make them feel that the rule of England was the reverse of a blessing. In bringing this Motion forward he was not actuated by any Party motive. He believed that all parties alike desired that our Indian Empire should rest on the growing contentment of the people; and he asked the House, before it was too late, resolutely to set to work to place on a secure and more economical basis the finances of a country whose poverty must excite their commiseration, and the well-being of whose people should engage their anxious, their watchful, and their constant care. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into and report upon the operation of 'The Government of India Act, 1858,' and the other Acts amending the same,"—(Mr. Fawcett),—instead thereof.

• Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. A. MILLS said, he believed the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) had done good service in bringing forward this question, but doubted whether this was a seasonable time to make such an inquiry as was proposed. There were two or three clauses of the Act of 1858 that were obviously inconsistent. He would more particularly mention the 41st and the 27th clauses. The former provided that there should be no actual expenditure from the Revenues of India without the control of the Secretary of State in Council, and that no appropriation of any such Revenues should be made without a majority of votes in the Council; while the 27th clause was to the effect that any order not being an order for which a majority of votes was necessary might, after the commencement of the Act, be sent by the Secretary of State without a meeting of the Council. It was thus competent for the Secretary of State—although he could not, without the consent of the Council, order so insignificant a charge on the Revenues of India as the cost of mending an arm-chair in the India Office—on his own authority to send a despatch which might involve India in a costly war without the slightest possibility of any control being exercised by the Council, though that, in truth, was the very object and function of the Council. If the House desired to treat the matter seriously and wisely, it could only do so by amending the Act of 1858. That would have to be done sooner or later; though he could not say whether or not the appointment of a Committee was the best way of approaching the subject. With regard to another point: the hon. Member for Hackney had alluded to the increased charge thrown on the Indian Revenue by the Amalgamation Act of 1860. Probably very few persons realized what that increase was; but it was a fact that under the old system, before the Amalgamation Act, the average military charge in India was £12,000,000; while the average since the passing of that Act was no less than £16,000,000. That sum was solely for the ordinary military charges, and not for such exceptional expenses as those consequent on an Afghan War. The main point was, whether it was possible so to construct the whole government of India as to keep the power and responsibility in the hands of the Secretary of State, at the same time investing the Council with a real financial control. He did not think that would be impossible, particularly as the Indian Council were elected on the ground of their knowledge of Indian finance, and as the exercise of their dis-creation in time past had proved their capacity for power. The hon. Member for Hackney had described the Council as tongue-tied, and unable to criticize the Secretary of State. That was, to some extent, an exaggeration; but the point was, not that members of the Council could not express their opinions freely, but that they had little or no controlling power. Sooner or later some step must be taken in amending the Act of 1858, and, in his (Mr. Mill's) opinion, the sooner the better. It was no objection to immediate action to talk of the present House as a moribund Parliament. To that phrase he strongly objected. But, after all, if their political future was but brief, that very fact ought all the more to stimulate their energies; otherwise it might be argued with equal force that the entire Session ought to be spent in idleness and inactivity.

MR. GRANT DUFF agreed with a great many, though by no means with all, the observations that had fallen from his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett). The hon. Member wished to persuade the House that the financial control now exercised over Indian expenditure was inadequate, and sought a remedy in the appointment of a Select Committee to consider the working of the Government of India Act and the other Acts amending the same. After listening to his hon. Friend's statement, he still held the opinion that among the many and great evils that already afflicted, and the still greater evils that threatened, Indian finance, an inadequate control over expenditure found no place. If an elaborate machinery of control, constantly and carefully worked during the last 20 years, could have made our Indian expenditure a thing agreeable to contemplate, we should have had great reason to be satisfied. But the machinery for controlling Indian expenditure had been, at various periods of our history, very indifferent; and the evils that were wrought even in the worst times by a defective system of control were as nothing compared to the ill effects of errors in our general policy. If the state of the finances of India were, as he admitted it to be, a subject for uneasiness and alarm, it was the result of grave errors in recent policy, not of any defective control. It would be generally admitted that an effective financial control over the Indian Executive must be exercised in England, and by the one authority greater than the Viceroy—namely, the Secretary of State and his Council. Some persons imagined that the power of the Council was shadowy. He maintained that it was enormous, and would mention one fact. He could speak only of what had occurred under the administration of the Duke of Argyll; but, except on very rare occasions, the same procedure had, no doubt, been followed by all Secretaries of State for India. While the Duke of Argyll was at the India Office, there must have been something over 100 questions submitted for the decision of the Indian Council every week. He was there for more than five years, and he had never once overruled his Council, so that, in that time, they had said as a body "Yes" or "No" to nearly 30,000 questions, many of them of the greatest possible importance. Could a body be said to have only a shadowy power to which not only every question directly relating to any appropriation to be made, or any grant to be given, from the Revenues of India was necessarily submitted, but which, in practice, decided upon almost every large question connected with India? He said upon almost every question, for there were, as was well known, certain reservations made in the legislation which governed the powers of the Council. There were some people—not very many, he believed—who would sweep away these reservations, and who thought that every question connected with India should be finally decided by the vote of the Indian Council. There were others who thought that every question should be submitted to it, and that its advice should necessarily be taken on absolutely every subject. To the first of these propositions he would be entirely opposed; against the second he should have a good deal to advance if this were the time to discuss it. He would only now observe that the question resolved itself into this—Was Parliament to be the supreme arbiter of Indian as of all other affairs, or was it not? If Parliament was not to remain the supreme arbiter, he did not know that this high trust could be in better hands than those of the Indian Council, consisting, as it did, of the picked men of Indian experience. But was Parliament prepared, on the advice of any Committee, however composed, to abdicate its power into the hands of any Council, however able? This would be to take a most momentous step—to go back not only upon the legislation of 1858, but on that of 1784. For, although before 1858 there was what was called a double Government, Parliament had been the supreme arbiter of Indian affairs for two generations and a-half before the abolition of the Court of Directors and the Board of Control. If anyone doubted this, let him re-read the debates which arose in the Session of 1858, and more especially the speech of his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe), in which he narrated his experiences of the so-called double Government, gained as Secretary to the Board of Control. That speech had not been answered by any debater, and never would be answered either by philosopher or by historian. He had heard out-of-doors that it would be desirable to amend the Government of India Act in the sense of having something like the old Secret Committee, which consisted of the President of the Board of Control and the Chairman and Deputy Chairman of the Court of Directors; but hon. Members who had examined into the question must have found that the “Secret Committee” was simply another name for the President of the Board of Control; and he should be much surprised to learn that, even in recent affairs which did not come before the Council, individual counsellors had not exercised more influence than was ever exercised by the “two chairs” in the old days of the Company. But it was said the Court of Directors exercised a very real power in that they were able to recall the Governor General. In one case in all history the Court did so; and in that particular instance he should be very much surprised if the Governor General was not recalled with the good wishes of the Ministry of the day. But should not the Council have the same power? If it had, you would have this anomaly—a Cabinet irresponsible to Parliament would have the power of opposing on a vital matter a Cabinet responsible to Parliament, and the very first time it did so the power would be taken away. The Court of Directors had represented at least the money interests of the proprietors; whereas the Indian Council would have no constituency to fall back on. His hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) always looked back upon the rule of the Company as a kind of golden age. But that golden age was about as sterling metal as other golden ages. We had not yet learned to govern India with perfect wisdom; but we were a good deal nearer doing so than we had been 20 years ago, owing, in great measure, to the continuous action of enlightened English opinion exerted through Parliament upon the great, broad questions of Indian affairs. He spoke only of the great broad questions, for he thought that all that interference with details which some persons had tried to induce the House to engage in had been either mischievous or futile. Details should be left exclusively to the authorities in India, to the Indian Council, and to the Secretary of State. He wished to express no opinion upon the question whether it would or would not be expedient at the beginning of a new Parliament to have a Committee selected from both Houses, and on which every man who had a considerable acquaintance with Indian affairs should serve, to discuss the present system of Indian government. That Committee, however, if it was to do any good, must be presided over by a statesman of the greatest authority. He also expressed no opinion as to whether the Government of India Act might not be amended. He thought that much might be said for a short declaratory Act to settle the question, which had been discussed in “another place” in the year 1869, as to what the statutory powers of the Council with reference to finance were meant by Parliament to be. These questions, however, were not now before the House. The question before them was whether they should refer to a Select Committee of that House alone, at a moment when they had, thanks to the accidents of Elections, by no means a large number of men of Indian experience in it, and when the House, even if it lived out its days, was certainly not very far from its end, the whole constitution of Indian government, on the ground of the control now exercised over expenditure not being sufficient. He thought that the control now exercised by the Council over expenditure was sufficient. This was not the time, and a Select Committee of that House alone was not the way, to inquire into the Government of India Act, and he must accordingly decline to support his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney. He should be very sorry, however, if anyone were to suppose that he did not think the state of Indian finances very unsatisfactory, or that the Government of India Act was susceptible of amendment. The Indian Government, when the late Government handed it over to their Successors, was in the position of a great landowner who was somewhat embarrassed, but could just pay his way. It was now in the position of a great landowner who, having had a succession of bad years from no fault of his own, had had the folly to involve himself in an expensive lawsuit with a neighbour, the least unsatisfactory issue of which would be the acquisition of an estate which would be a damnosa hereditas indeed, requiring an expenditure upon it which might easily, in a few years' time, lead him to destruction.

MR. ONSLOW said, he differed from the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) with respect to the financial condition of the old East India Company, which was its great weakness; and he had been surprised to hear the hon. Member assert that economy had been one of the strongest points of that Company. The following figures he had carefully tabulated from the records of the House, and he could vouch for their accuracy. From the years 1814 to 1860, inclusive, there had only been surpluses in 13 years, amounting together to £8,895,000, while there had been deficits in the remaining 33 years amounting to £72,200,000—that was, an average surplus for 13 years of £684,200, and an average deficit for 33 years of £5,540,000. Between 1800 and 1859 the Debt had been increased in 44 years, while it had been diminished in 15 years only; so that, up to that time, we had in the aggregate a huge deficit, and a substantial accretion of Debt. When Mr. Wilson went out to India, in 1859, there had been a deficit for four years, amounting to £37,000,000. And all this was under the old East India Company. Thus it was clear that during the rule of that Company there were far larger deficits than since the Crown had taken the affairs of India under its direct control. Now, he would be the last person to blame too much the acts of the old East India Company; but, still, the figures adduced would, he thought, show that however much there might have been a desire for economy, still the East India Company were not successful in the administration of the finances of India. It had been truly remarked that the finance of India was a matter of surprise, because the chief part of the Revenue was derived from opium, and it was never known whether the Estimate would in any year be realized or exceeded; while at any time numerous little wars, or panics, or famines, or even cyclones, might overthrow the best calculations. In these circumstances, he could not see how the appointment of a Committee of that House could prevent the finance of India being a matter of surprise. It was impossible all at once to Americanize Indian institutions, which must be dealt with tentatively and gradually. He believed that the waste of money in India was not owing to the extravagance of Viceroy or of their Councils, but to the pressure brought to bear upon the Secretary of State by hon. Members in that House, who compelled him to force the Viceroy to spend money on objects which the latter were aware would be of no practical use, or, at all events, not so useful as many other projects. Taking the case of the building of the barracks in India: every hon. Member in that House respected Miss Nightingale, who had done so much good for our soldiers; but that lady, having gone out to India and seen the condition of the barracks there, had put such pressure upon that House, and upon the Secretary of State, that no less than £12,000,000 had been spent upon the erection of new barracks there which were practically of very little use, and, therefore, that money might be said to have been thrown away in pursuit of this philanthropic object. He did not see how the Viceroy could have resisted the pressure that was then brought to bear upon him, though, backed by his Council, he should have refused to consent to this extravagant expenditure. It must, however, be remembered that that extravagance originated, not in India, but at home. It was also owing to pressure at home that so many millions more than were necessary were spent in relief of the Famine in 1874. It was impossible for any Committee sitting even three days a-week to frame an adequate Report upon this subject in the course of a single Session. The hon. Member for Hackney said that their great object should be the contentment of the people of India; but he met that statement by asserting that the people of India were far more contented now than they were under the rule of the old East India Company. The hon. Member had further objected to the members of the Council being appointed for 10 years only; but that was far better than the old system, under which many members scarcely did anything in return for the large salaries they received, owing to physical incapacity. He could assure the hon. Member that hon. Members on that side of the House took quite as deep an interest in the welfare of India as he did; and he trusted that in discussing this question Party feelings would not be allowed to interfere. On these grounds, he submitted that no practical good would result from the proposal of the hon. Member being agreed to.

MR. LAING said, he recognized the very difficult position in which the finances of India now stood. The word "unsatisfactory" had been used; but to his mind that word was not strong enough, for the country was now drifting with accelerating rapidity into the gulf of bankruptcy. He disagreed with the policy of taxing any further the people of India for the purpose of getting a surplus, and the Government should exercise a wise economy by so managing the finances as not to increase the deficits. If a wise and prudent policy had been followed, India would now have found herself in a much better position than she was in. If the military expenditure had been economically managed, she might have found herself in a position of perfect solvency, with a surplus and diminished taxation. India had been overtaken by financial and commercial calamities which nobody could foresee. They should remember, that according to Sir John Strachey's figures, the whole net Revenue of India was between £37,000,000 and £38,000,000 sterling. It was a complete delusion to talk about £70,000,000. Out of that sum they had been affected to the extent of not less than £5,000,000 a-year by two unforeseen calamities. The depreciation of silver had led to an estimated loss in the current year of £3,500,000; and they had also had a succession of Famines calling for a heavy expenditure, and for a Famine Insurance Fund which was estimated at £1,500,000. Those two items took away £5,000,000 out of the £37,500,000, which was all they had to meet the whole expenditure of India. The military expenditure, which was, in round numbers, £17,000,000, had to be defrayed out of the £37,500,000, or rather out of the £32,500,000, which was all they had left if they made those inevitable deductions for the loss by the exchange on silver, and for the necessity of providing against the recurrence of Famine. They had been going on steadily from bad to worse financially in India, and spending more than they received. The pressure of the Debt during 20 years had been doubled, and during the last few years, owing to the depreciation of silver and the Afghan War, that Debt was going on at an accelerating rate. They were coming very closely up to the point where the people of India must look fairly in the face the question of what they were going to do if India, very much from the consequences of their policy, became insolvent. If they could not either increase the Revenue or diminish the Expenditure, the simplest child in a national school could tell them there was only one result before them—namely, that, as had happened with Turkey, Egypt, Spain, and other countries, they would find India landed in financial bankruptcy. Now, he maintained that they could not increase the Revenue of India. That was proved by a sort of reductio ad absurdum. The attempt was made last year to establish a Famine Insurance Fund. It was found that to keep up the show of solvency they must raise £1,500,000 by fresh taxation from the people of India, and they were driven to such straits that they had to impose a 5 per cent licence-tax on men earning 4s. per week, and also to increase the salt tax. That was proof positive that they could not increase their available Revenue by any mode of laying on additional taxation. They had given the last turn to the screw. Their Revenue was all derived from about six sources. They could not increase the land revenue, except, perhaps, by means of improved cultivation—a very slow and gradual process. Their receipts from opium were very precarious. They were liable to be affected by contingencies arising in China, and by the competition of the native-grown product in that country. When they tried to increase their opium revenue in one year, that tended to diminish it in the following year. If it went up one year, it generally went down the next, and they could not reckon on any steady increase from that source. It had been held out to them that they were to cover the expenses of the Afghan War by the extra receipts from opium, but that prospect had vanished. Another head of Revenue was the Customs. An impending Dis-solution was in the air, and they had heard of the pressure which Lancashire was likely to employ to obtain the remission of the Indian import duties. It was therefore more likely that they would have a diminution rather than an increase of the Indian Customs revenue. Again, the salt tax was now at a much higher point than it ought to be, and it was very desirable to equalize it by levelling it downwards. Neither could they look for much more from Stamps. In fact, taxation in India had reached its extreme limits, if it did not already even go beyond the bounds which humanity and political prudence should prescribe for it. Then, as to their expenditure—£17,000,000 of which was for the Army—no doubt, by a vigorous and close economy, they could save a little here and there; but they had really a very small amount to work upon. The £4,500,000 of interest upon the Debt they could not touch; neither could they cut down the superannuations. The charges for law, justice, and police, over a country as big as Europe, and containing nearly 200,000,000 of population, took £5,500,000—a sum which could not easily be reduced. Then they had only about £7,000,000 left. The general administration and miscellaneous expenditure absorbed about £3,500,000. As regarded the loss from the alteration in the value of silver, they could no more evade it than they could evade the effect of a bad season on the harvest. The position in which they now were with regard to the question of the stock of silver brought them face to face with the Army expenditure. When he was in India he had to meet a deficit of £6,000,000, which had to be cleared away in two years. That was only to be done by economy, and economy in India meant military reduction. Of the £6,000,000 reduction, £5,000,000 were in the Army and Navy. Was there any prospect whatever of the military expenditure now being reduced? That was the whole problem; and it was a question not of detail but of policy. The British Government had increased the expenses of the Army in India, first by the amalgamation of the Services, by doing away with a separate Indian Army, contrary to the best advice at the time, and by the introduction of an extravagant Staff system; and, second, by the short-service system, which had led to a great increase in the cost of transport. Well, that was gone; and he would be too sanguine if he hoped they would get back to the old system. What remained? It only remained to reduce the numbers of the Army. If India could have been kept in a state of peace—no external wars—the swell of the great Mutiny tempest subsiding, the country being traversed by railways and growing richer, he thought the wise policy would have been to follow up the labours of Lord Mayo and Lord Northbrook. He spoke from no Party point of view. The death of Lord Mayo was deeply to be lamented. If they could have had a second Lord Mayo instead of Lord Lytton, and Lord Mayo's policy supported by the Home Government, the country might have effected large military reductions, and, instead of an expenditure of £17,000,000, which would be augmented by the Afghan War and the extension of the Frontier, they might have done with £15,000,000 or £15,500,000. Both ends might have been made to meet, notwithstanding the silver calamity, without fresh taxation. As matters stood now, what was the prospect? Did anyone suppose that the Afghan War was going to cost anything like the figure—£950,000—thrown out by the Government? They might as well call it £95,000. Mr. Forbes was certainly not a bad authority. He was the correspondent of The Daily News, and was so well known to them all by his admirable accounts of military affairs. He was the best military correspondent, one would say, and he said it was perfectly childish to suppose that they would get out of the Afghan War without paying £5,000,000; that if they did, they would be exceedingly well off. Most hon. Members recollected the China and Abyssinian Wars, the Estimates, and the ultimate Expenditure. It appeared to him (Mr. Laing) that the £2,000,000 talked of had been arrived at by a rough estimate that the war would cost £4,000,000, and that England would pay half. As to the £2,000,000 to be advanced to India as a loan without interest, did anyone suppose that that "loan" would ever be repaid by India unless by India raising fresh loans? Would it be paid out of savings of Revenue? What was the conclusion they must come to? That there was something impending, and that upon the eve of a General Election it was not desirable to impose more taxes on the people of England than were necessary. Therefore, that loan was put to a suspense account, without any idea that it would be repaid. Whatever might be the cost of the Afghan War, did anyone suppose that they could get a diminution of military expenditure by extending the Frontier of India—by securing a scientific Frontier? He had seen in some influential organs of the Press—or organs that used to be influential—the statement that now they had got a scientific Frontier, they had nothing to do but to reduce their Army one-half. That was so puerile, that he might pass it by. An extended Frontier required a large number of stations and garrisons, and the men at those extreme points would be no longer available at a distance in India. There was one great mistake made—and it was, in his opinion, the only mistake made by Canning—after the Mutiny. The opportunity ought to have been seized to disband the Native Armies, which now, he believed, were numerically stronger than their own Army. They could not risk again the dangers which were incurred during that Mutiny. Then, were they prepared to say boldly to these Native Princes—"This sort of thing cannot go on. You must disarm. We will protect you against internal and external enemies?" Unless something of that kind was done, it would be impossible to diminish the Indian Army, especially as it from time to time became necessary to send portions of that Army to distant points from which they could not return promptly to repress disturbances that might arise in other parts of the country. On this point there were no greater authorities than Lord Sandhurst, who combined the qualities of a statesman with those of a soldier, and Sir Henry Norman. The first of those authorities had stated his opinion that to extend the Frontier of India into Afghanistan would involve an additional annual expenditure of no less than £3,000,000; and Sir Henry Norman's view was, that the maintenance of a so-called "scientific Frontier" would cost at least an additional £1,500,000 per annum. If they were going to put £1,500,000 sterling as the additional expense to their military expenditure, he wanted to know how, if they put that on the top of the deficit which they had owing to their loss by the exchange in silver and the Famine Fund, they proposed to go on? Had the Government fully looked that matter in the face? Did the Government propose additional taxation? If not, how was the augmented expenditure to be met? Unless the Government were prepared to levy fresh taxation, how long did they imagine they could go on tiding over their difficulties by fresh loans, unless those loans were backed up by British guarantees? He warned the Government that such a condition of things could not last very long, and in the end England would have to pay the bill. In these circumstances, he ventured to urge that it was high time the House of Commons investigated the matter; and he was of opinion that the appointment of a Committee, before which witnesses could be examined who were thoroughly conversant with the subject, would tend to the education—the necessary education—of Her Majesty's Ministers in one of the most important branches of the duty which they had to perform, and that such education would re-act upon the Viceroy, who had to manage the affairs of India on the spot.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Mr. Speaker, while I rejoice that this debate has been carried on with comparative freedom from Party feeling in the temper of the discussions which I remember during the existence of the East India Company, still I feel that the position of this House, although we have the advantage of the experience of the hon. Member who has just sat down (Mr. Laing), is greatly weakened by the Statutes, which forbid any member of the Indian Council from occupying a seat in Parliament. I regret that prohibition all the more, because in the last resort, as was ably stated by the late Secretary of State for India, the Parliament of England must be held responsible for the government of India. This House owes reparation to the people of that country. In 1869 Statutes, which at present govern India, were passed. There was a debate in the House of Lords, where these measures were introduced; and in the course of discussion the highest legal authorities at that time—Lord Cairns, Lord Hatherley, and the highest Indian authorities, including at least one ex-Governor General of India—were at variance with each other as to the purport of these Bills, and the interpretation to be put upon their provisions. These Bills came down to this House, and here there was positively scarcely one word spoken upon either Bill, at any of their stages. It was one of the most extraordinary instances I ever knew, in my somewhat long experience, of important measures passing this House without debate. Here was an Act—the principal Act—which totally changed the responsibility of the several persons of the Body entrusted with the supreme Executive Government of India, and yet these Bills were allowed to slip through the House of Commons without the semblance of debate. I, for one, expected that these Bills would be deferred to another Session; still I was on the watch; but the principal stage, the final stage, of these Bills passed at 40 minutes after 12 o'clock at night, quite at the end of the Session. These Bills were passed without one word of real debate, and without apparently the slightest consideration. I refer hon. Members to Hansard for the verification of that statement. There were doubts as to the interpretation of the principal Act of 1869. We know that these doubts existed after the measure passed the House of Lords. The manner in which the Act was allowed to slip through this House in 1869 is a strong additional reason in support of the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett). It appeared to me that the hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff), the late Under Secretary of State for India, spoke as if the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney had reference only to the financial affairs of India. That supposition seems to me very strange, when I remember that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Grant Duff) has had considerable Indian experience, and must have known that measures have subsequently passed greatly altering—reforming, I suppose it is called—the Act of 1858. What are the terms of the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney?—

the chief of which subsequent Acts is the Act of 1869. Perhaps the House will allow me to show how grave a change was made in the form of government in India by that Act, or rather two Acts, c. 97 and c. 98 of 1869. I will refer to an authority, which cannot be supposed to be influenced by any Party considerations. In the Statesman's Year Book for 1867 I find the following description of the form of government at that time:—

“The administration of the Indian Empire is entrusted by the Charter of August 2, 1858, to a Council of State for India. The Council consists of fifteen members, of whom seven are elected by the Court of Directors from their own body, and eight are nominated by the Crown. Vacancies in the Council, if among those nominated, are filled up by Her Majesty, and if among the elected, by an election by the other members of the Council; but the major part of the Council must be of persons who have served or resided 10 years in India, and have not left India more than 10 years previous to the date of their appointment.”

Here is a description, of the present form of government, taken from the Statesman's Year Book for 1877, and I quote from this authority because it gives a summary, and I have almost invariably found this work reliable—

“The Government of the Indian Empire is entrusted by Act 21 and 22, Victoria, cap. 106, amended by 32 and 33 Victoria, cap. 97, to a Secretary of State for India, aided by a Council of fifteen members, of whom at first seven were elected by the Court of Directors from their own body, and eight were nominated by the Crown. In future, vacancies in the Council will be filled up by the Secretary of State for India.”

I need not point out to the House how enormous is the change which has taken place in the constitution of the Government of India, consequent upon the passing of this Act. As I have already stated, the leading Members of the House of Lords differed as to the purport and interpretation of the first and chief of the two Acts of 1869. I think this is a ground why this House, which allowed the Acts of 1869 to pass without debate, ought to make reparation to the people of India by now performing the duty which we ought to have performed in 1869. Reference has been made to the Revenues of India at various periods under the East India Company's administration. The hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow) stated that there were larger excesses of expenditure, larger deficits during the rule of the Company than there have been since the Crown has taken the affairs of India under its control, and that a great deal of pressure for the expenditure of money in India really originated in this country. I would remind the hon. Member that there have been great practical changes in the Government of India during the long period to which he referred, and that the cost of the acquisition of large territories must involve the outlay of capital as well as income. A Petition was presented to this House, in 1858, by my late Friend, Mr. Thomas Baring, on behalf of the East India Company, who were then aware that the Government of India would be transferred to the Crown. In that document they say—

“Your Petitioners cannot well conceive a worse form of government for India than a Minister with a Council, whom he should be at liberty to consult or not at his pleasure, or whose advice he should be able to disregard, without giving his reasons in writing, and in a manner likely to carry conviction. Such an arrangement, your Petitioners submit, would be really liable to the objections, in their opinion, erroneously urged against the present system. Your Petitioners respectfully represent, that any body of persons, associated with the Minister, which is not a check, will be a screen. Unless the Council is so constituted as to be personally independent of the Minister, unless it feels itself responsible for recording an opinion on every Indian subject, and pressing that opinion on the Minister, whether it is agreeable to him or not, and unless the Minister, when he overrules their opinion, is bound to record his reasons, their existence will only serve to weaken his responsibility, and to give the colourable sanction of prudence to measures, in the framing of which those qualities have had no share.”

These statements were made in 1858, and had weight in the framing of the Statute of that year, 11 years before the Act of 1869, which gave effect to the system thus deprecated by anticipation, was passed; and I ask whether, in the result, the prediction of the Petitioners, this body of experts, has not been in many respects fulfilled—whether, by having passed the Act of 1869, without due consideration in this House, we have not really reduced the Council to total and speechless subordination to the Secretary of State; whether having reduced the Council to such a position, there is not great danger of its becoming, unconsciously perhaps, simply a screen for the Secretary of State, instead of its serving as a check upon both his legislative acts and upon the expenditure? I fully admit that my knowledge of these subjects is old; that it has been drawn from my having served on the Committee of 1853, and taken part in the debates of that year, and also in the discussions of 1858, when I enjoyed the confidence of the late Lord Derby. But I, humbly and respectfully, submit, that since the year 1858 the House of Commons has never seriously considered this most important subject, the form and method of the Government of India; and I respectfully urge that the time has come when, in justice to the people of India, and ultimately in justice to the people of this country, this House is bound to repair the oversight and neglect of 1869, and gravely to consider the form of government to which it will delegate the exercise of the supreme authority over India. The House cannot divest itself of responsibility in this matter. Are we to give up India? I ask the House that question. If we are not to give up India, then, I would ask, whence is this deficit of Revenue, the great excess of Indian expenditure, to be supplied? Must not any ultimate deficit be supplied out of the Revenues of this country? I, for one, believe that this country will not give up India. But I can see that, if we are to go on guaranteeing debt, it will land us in grave difficulties. Guaranteeing debt is simply the equivalent of postponing payment. Therefore, on the part of the people of England, I urge the House to adopt the proposal of the hon. Member for Hackney; and I cannot conceive any hon. Member of the House, or any Member of Her Majesty's Government, would find that he had suffered in the estimation of the constituencies of this country, if they were to turn their attention to this great and important task. I see the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) in his place. We have long differed on questions of commercial policy. I must say that I view with apprehension the fact that the commercial difficulties and other causes are inducing the local Governments of the Colonies and of India to impose heavy import duties upon the produce of this country, in the case of some Colonies amounting to from 17 to 20 per cent. If there be any value in the doctrines of Free Trade, I trust that my right hon. Colleague for Birmingham will apply himself to urging the application of those doctrines within the British Empire.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that when he heard the Notice of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) given, he confessed it was with some regret he learned that the hon. Member thought it his duty to bring this somewhat delicate question under the attention of the House; because it might appear to some persons out-of-doors who were unacquainted with the subject to imply that some difficulty had arisen in the matter, and that the relations between the Secretary of State and his Council had reached a point requiring the interposition of the Legislature. Nothing could possibly be further from the fact. The relations between the Council of India and the noble Lord the Secretary of State, and he might add also the late Secretary of State, were cordial and harmonious. The machinery which had been devised by the wisdom of Parliament for the government of India was working almost without friction; and if difficulties should arise, or had arisen, in the course of business, he was confident they would be overcome, as they had been overcome, by the exercise of tact or of forbearance either on the one side or on the other. Hon. Members who had addressed the House had called its attention, to a very considerable extent, to the existing position of Indian finance. The hon. Member for Orkney (Mr. Laing) would forgive him if he did not follow him into all the intricacies of that subject—the more that many of them were not involved in the question before the House. He proposed rather to address himself to the substantial point at issue; but, at the same time, he could not allow one or two statements of the hon. Member for Orkney to pass without a word of reply. The hon. Member had attempted to ridicule the Estimate brought forward in December last as to the expense of the Afghan Expedition. He was glad to be able to inform the House that as far as he had any information at that moment—and he would have better next week—the Estimate of the Government had been borne out completely. He had stated what he believed would be required during the course of the present financial year, and he had reason to believe, from private letters he had received, that the Estimate would not be exceeded. He would reserve a statement as to the expenditure in the next financial year until the introduction of the Budget. He should like also to say a word as to what was constantly repeated in that House with reference to the salt tax. A great number of hon. Members appeared to think the increase in the salt tax was for the purpose of providing a Famine Insurance Fund. This was not at all the fact. The increase had been made for the purpose of equalizing the salt duty all over India. He should be much surprised if it were not found at the conclusion of the financial year that this step had been a bold and wise one, which had led to a considerable increase in the consumption of salt in Northern India and, he hoped, to no decrease in the South. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) had alluded to the present financial condition of India; and here he felt bound to say that he had a deep debt of gratitude to the hon. Member for a recent utterance of his in relation to that subject. He referred to an article from his pen in one of the monthly magazines. If the controversies on this question were always conducted in the fair and candid tone in which that article was written, they might soon be able to arrive at some means of improving the financial condition of India. He could hardly be expected to enter into a discussion of the broad and general propositions which the hon. Member had laid down to-night with reference to Indian finance. He was quite ready to admit that they contained a great deal of truth; but they also contained a great deal that would necessitate explanation on his part. He should be prepared to go into details on a suitable occasion; but if he refused to go into all the hon. Member's propositions at present, he hoped it would not be understood that he assented to them all. But there was one of his statements which he would allude to at once. The hon. Member had characterized the proposed loan of £2,000,000 to India during the coming financial year as, if legal, practically a proclamation of bankruptcy. Such a statement was really very hard.

MR. FAWCETT: I did not say it was illegal. I said, that if it was contended that India ought to bear the whole charge of the war and you then advanced her money without interest, it shows she cannot pay it.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that if it was felt necessary that India should pay the expenses of the war, and £2,000,000 were advanced to her without interest, that was, according to the hon. Member, a proclamation of bankruptcy. The statement was a very hard one from the hon. Member for Hackney, who took so great an interest in the affairs of India, as he must be aware of the very difficult position they were at present placed in owing to the loss experienced by exchange. This was a matter beyond the control of Government, and one entirely independent of foreign affairs. The loss by exchange amounted during the present financial year to £3,500,000, and during the coming year it was expected to be still greater. In these peculiar circumstances, it was not fair to speak of the proposed loan as a proclamation of bankruptcy. The hon. Member had called attention to the very great growth of expenditure which had arisen since the time of the East India Company. No Minister who was responsible for the finance of India could fail to admit that this growth of expenditure, and the consequent charge on the Indian Revenue, was a source of very great anxiety. If any means of diminishing it could be suggested, Members would grasp at them with great satisfaction. But he must remind the hon. Member of statements that had been made upon this subject. The hon. Member for Orkney (Mr. Laing) pointed out the extreme difficulty of really reducing any expenditure except the Army expenditure; and Lord Northbrook had stated in the summer that he could not look forward in the immediate future to any substantial reduction of expenditure. And the fact really was that if any reduction of expenditure was to be made it would not be by general recommendations from home on the part of the Secretary of State or the Council of India, but only by constant and unremitting scrutiny of every financial detail in India itself. The hon. Member for Hackney said the expenditure of India had grown since the time when its government was transferred to the Crown. But so also had the expenditure of England in the same period. If the hon. Gentleman would take the trouble to compare the receipts and the expenditure of India in 1856-7, just before the Mutiny, with the last accounts received, making allowance at the same time for the Famine charges, which had been very large, and also for the loss by exchange, he would find that the Revenue had grown within that period to a very much larger extent than the expenditure. He made this statement after a careful comparison of the figures. But they must remember why this increase of expenditure had arisen. They had exercised a civilizing influence over the whole of India. They had made roads and railways; they had established educational agencies and Courts of Justice throughout the land; and in every way made improvements in the country and developed its resources. When the old East India Company was referred to, it ought to be borne in mind that in the 46 years preceding the Mutiny there were 33 years of deficit. When the old Company was abolished, what was the position of the Crown? It was left with a Treasury exhausted by the Mutiny, and great efforts had to be made under unparalleled difficulties to repair the disaster. The hon. Member contended that the financial control over India had become much worse since 1869, when an Act was passed by right hon. Gentlemen opposite which rendered the Council less independent than it had been before. In that year the Duke of Argyll had pointed out with great force in the House of Lords that, though it was no doubt very desirable to have the Council independent of the Secretary of State, there were, nevertheless, great evils in allowing old gentlemen who had outgrown their experience in India to remain members of the Council. One of the most urgent necessities was to have men of fresh Indian experience on the Council, in order that the Secretary of State might obtain the latest information as to facts. That was the object of the Act of 1869, and it seemed to him to have worked extremely well in this respect. The hon. Member had further argued that the Council exercised no control over the finance of India, because in a certain number of years which he named there was only a small number of dissents. But to take the dissents as an indication of the usefulness of the Council was to degrade that Council to a position he hoped he should never see it occupy. If one member of the Council differed from the rest, he had an opportunity of influencing his colleagues, and very often also the Secretary of State; and if he failed to convince them of the justice of his views, the House would be very slow in believing that he must necessarily be in the right and everybody else quite wrong. The hon. Member had also urged that if an illegal charge was made upon the finances of India, there was no one now, as in the old East India Company's days, who had a legal status to oppose that charge. The hon. Member could never have heard of the Auditor of Indian Accounts, who was independent of the Secretary of State, and who was appointed for the express purpose of examining financial details, and seeing whether or not those details had received the sanction of the Council, or were otherwise legally authorized. The hon. Member had spoken of ambiguity existing in the Act of 1858. No one who had examined some of the clauses could deny that there were points of extreme difficulty which were perfectly open to argument. In 1869, as the hon. Member had stated, the Marquess of Salisbury found the occasion opportune, because the Government of the day had a Bill before Parliament to amend the Government of India Act, 1858, to call the attention of the House to the law as regards the control of the Council of India; he explained the matter to their Lordships, and he asked the Government, if they felt any doubt on the matter, to consider whether words could not be introduced to make the intention of the Act perfectly clear. In answer, the Duke of Argyll made a speech, which showed the manner in which he interpreted the law. The Duke of Argyll said—

"It is the opinion of all whom I have consulted, including the Law Officers of the Crown, that under the present Statute it is unquestionably in the power of the Secretary of State for India to order in India any service which may appear to be required. . . . The Secretary of State is supreme in all matters whatever, except simply such matters as were included under the principle of the financial veto of Mr. Pitt (alluding to 26 Geo. III., c. 8), that is, direct grants or appropriations of money to persons either here or in India, which might be made for purposes of political jobbery. That I believe to be the state of the law; and if it be, I need hardly say that it makes the Secretary of State practically supreme in all matters, whether they do or do not cost money."—[3 Hansard, cxcv. 1074-5.]

After that, it would have been surprising if Lord Cairns had sat still. Such a statement of the law, and of the intention of Parliament in carrying the Act of 1858, could not be passed over by Members of the Government and of the Party who were responsible for it. Lord Cairns returned to the attack, and demolished the argument of the Duke of Argyll in a few sentences. But, on the part of the Government of the day, it was again answered that, in their belief, there was no practical difficulty in the matter; if there had been, they would have been perfectly prepared to deal with it; but, looking at the whole matter impartially, no practical difficulty had arisen, and Parliament ought not to interfere in so delicate a matter when no actual necessity had been shown for the amendment of the law. Ten years had passed, and practical experience had given an interpretation to the law of 1858 which had met with general acceptance. No doubt, it might be said that the wording of the Statute was open to various interpretations; but, at the same time, when they found that the law had been interpreted in a particular way, and had been acted upon without difficulty, the House would be reluctant to say it was a matter with which it ought to interfere. The hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff) had pointed out with great force that no difficulty had arisen, and he could cordially coincide with the hon. Gentleman's views, and could say that since the hon. Member ceased to be connected with the India Office the same was the case. He desired the House to consider two or three practical reasons why the proposal of the hon. Member for Hackney was simply an impossible one. The suggestion was, that the Council of India should be made perfectly independent and should be given absolute control over the finances of India.

Mr. FAWCETT said, he carefully guarded himself against making any such suggestion as that now attributed to him.

MR. E. STANHOPE: But the hon. Member's observations pointed to a large increase of the powers of the Council of India; because he showed that under the old system certain things were done by the old East India Company which the Council could not do, and left the House to infer that all the mischief that was arising was in consequence of that change. The hon. Member pointed out that the Council had no power of initiating business; that all the Bills that the Government thought it necessary to submit to Parliament did not necessarily come under the consideration of the Council; and also that questions of policy did not come now before the Council, as he thought they formerly did, under the review of the Company. These propositions were very well worthy of consideration; but if the House looked at them a little more closely, it would find that they pointed to arrangements which would reduce the Government of India Act of 1858 to a practical absurdity. If every penny spent in India or England was to be voted by the Council of India in England; if the Governor General of India was to have no power to expend money in India such as he had before the Act of 1858 and had enjoyed since; and if every single appropriation of money to the Services, whether in England or in India, was to come before the Council and be voted by the majority, the Government of India Act would be simply unworkable; and the first thing that would be done by any Government, whether of one side or of the other, would be to say that such a state of things was incompatible with the proper government of India and must be immediately altered. The second objection he had to the proposition of the hon. Member for Hackney was that it would practically hand over the whole foreign policy of this country, if it in any way touched Indian interests, to an utterly irresponsible body. The Cabinet, which represented Imperial interests and was called into existence by and had the support of the majority in this country, would devise a certain policy for the protection of those Imperial interests; and, according to the hon. Member for Hackney, that policy was to be liable to be overhauled by a body of gentlemen in the Council of India who, whatever their merits, were appointed to that Council solely for the purpose of looking after Indian interests, and not with reference to other considerations.

MR. FAWCETT explained that he simply drew a comparison between the power exercised by the Directors of the East India Company and that of the Council. If he had had a distinct Motion to propose about the Council, he should have moved it; but he did not advocate that the Council should have these functions.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that the hon. Member brought these things forward as reasons why the Government was more expensive now than then. [Mr. FAWCETT said he quoted Lord Cairns.] Yes; he quoted the speech of Lord Cairns, and went on to urge that under the Act the Council had the power by law of which he was speaking. The proposition which the hon. Gentleman had stated in the House led to a practical absurdity; and Lord Cairns had urged that, if the law were so, it ought to be altered. The Cabinet was intrusted with the consideration of important questions affecting Imperial interests. It was bound by ties of common political interest, and it conducted its deliberations in perfect secrecy. If the Indian Council had the functions suggested, and the Cabinet had to submit to the Council questions of foreign policy in any way affecting India, the secrets of the Cabinet would be known to gentlemen not bound by the same considerations of secrecy, and in some cases gentlemen of opposite political opinions, and thus a great Constitutional change would be effected. The Act of 1858 had given to the Government, or the Secretary of State for India for the time being, the power of declaring war without consulting the Council. Was it to be supposed that Parliament really meant he was to have the power of declaring war without consulting his Council, if it had not also meant that he should have the power of ordering the expenditure necessary for the purpose? That this was contemplated was shown by the fact that the Act provided that, in that particular case in which it was clear the Council of India could not have control, Parliament should be informed of the declaration of war, and the finances of India should not be applied to the purpose without the consent of Parliament. He hoped that no Secretary of State would attempt to get rid of his own responsibility by saying that he had been forced to act against his will by a majority of his Council. Certainly, the present Secretary of State had done nothing of the kind, but had taken the responsibility of having initiated the Frontier war, and had submitted the matter to the judgment of Parliament, which had expressed its approval by decisive majorities. He did not believe for a moment it was the intention of the Act of 1858 to render Indian finance independent of Parliament. If the hon. Member's construction of the Act could be upheld, the Council could snap their fingers at Parliament and at the Cabinet, and could refuse a particular expenditure, in spite of anything the Government or the House could say. Of course, under such circumstances, the Government of India would be reduced to a deadlock. He did not suggest that any gentleman likely to be appointed to the Indian Council would bring matters to such a pass; but he was bound to point out what would be the inevitable result, if the construction which the hon. Member put upon the Act was correct. Then the hon. Gentleman said there were great acts of extravagance committed by the Indian Government; and he seemed to suggest that all that could be put right if they were to resort to something like the old system of administration, and to give a power of control to some body of gentlemen outside of Parliament. It appeared to him that many of the acts of extravagance to which the hon. Gentleman alluded, if they were so, had actually been sanctioned by the Council of India; and, therefore, apparently, the way to check such extravagance would be to make the Secretary of State really responsible in the matter. He hoped, however, the House would not suppose he thought that the financial control of the Council ought to be anything but a reality. Indeed, he thought it was a reality now. The hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff) had conclusively proved that the Council exercised very important functions in controlling Indian expenditure. That financial control was limited, however, by practical considerations. Was Parliament, in the ultimate resort, to have the control or not? The exact limit of the functions of the Secretary of State and of the Council it would be somewhat difficult to define in precise terms, and he was not going now to lay down any authoritative expression of opinion on the subject. The jurisdiction of the Council arose upon drafts of despatches laid before it by the Secretary of State. Those drafts were first sent to a Committee for consideration, and subsequently they were submitted to the Council. The Council had absolute power over those drafts if they embodied any financial question, and it could overrule the Secretary of State and uphold that overruling. Hon. Gentlemen should not narrow their view by considering this question solely in respect of the exact interpretation of an Act of Parliament. He was quite prepared to meet the question which had been raised as to the object and intention of the Act of 1858. Was the object and intention of that Act to diminish the responsibility of the Secretary of State? He believed the object was to establish a Department of the Government strictly subject to Parliamentary control, and likewise to establish a Council of responsible Advisers to assist the Secretary of State on Indian questions. Secondly, it was intended to impose a check on the Secretary of State for India in cases where Parliament was unable or unwilling to interfere. These powers had, in his judgment, been well exercised by the Council. He did not know that anybody could suggest anything which could take the place of the Council. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Hackney said they ought to inquire at once into these questions, because it was desirable to have, while they could obtain it, the opinion of Lord Lawrence. He thought no man could give a better opinion than the noble Lord, who had served under the old and the new systems, and who, moreover, had been Governor General of India. But, in point of fact, Lord Lawrence was examined by a Committee of that House in 1873, when he expressed a general approval of the existing state of affairs. The noble Lord was asked—

“Is it your opinion that, on the whole, the Council is effective for the purpose of controlling the expenditure in India?”

And his reply was—

“I think they are effective. It really comes to this, it seems to me, whether the expenditure which is proposed is really a politic one or not. If the Council consider it impolitic, they have ample means of opposing the expenditure."

He thought the Council did exercise a perfectly practical control over the finances of India in all those cases in which they could really exercise any such control; and as he did not see that the hon. Member for Hackney had made out any particular case with regard to defects in the existing system, he asked the House not to grant the Inquiry which the hon. Gentleman desired. The hon. Member for Orkney (Mr. Laing), who spoke with great experience on this subject, had also proposed the appointment of a Committee, but on very different grounds. He, for one, would not shrink from any assistance that any Member of the House might be willing to render to the Government with respect to Indian finance. Undoubtedly, they had great difficulties to deal with, and if any assistance could be given to them they would be glad to receive it. With regard, however, to the appointment of a Committee to roam over the whole condition of Indian finance, he thought they had had sufficient experience of such an Inquiry in the last Parliament. A Committee sat during a considerable number of Sessions; but, after examining a great many questions, it was unable to arrive at any report at all. On that ground, also, he believed that the Committee now proposed would not do any good. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) asked for a Committee, not only on financial grounds, but to inquire into the whole constitution of the government of India. Nobody would be more ready than he himself was to admit that the Act for the Government of India was not to be regarded as a perfect one, and in quiet times, no doubt, any Government would be ready to consider whether there were not details which might be amended; but they had already before them the facts necessary for the full consideration of the case. The Constitution of India was a thoroughly anomalous one, and it was almost impossible to reconcile their despotic government in India with their representative institutions in England. It would not bear straining. And he thought it would not be strained while they had on the Indian Council gentlemen like those who now composed it. Believing that no practical difficulty had arisen in the administration of affairs at the India Office, and considering, in particular, the control which the Government of the day ought to exercise in India and in England, he asked the House to reject the proposition of the hon. Member for Hackney.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he could not help observing that some of the statements of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India had exhibited the spirit and audacity of youth. As regarded the expenses of the Afghan War, he said he had received accounts from India, from which he had reason to believe that the expenses of that war, even on the scale on which it had been carried on, would not up to the end of the financial year exceed the moderate figure which had been suggested at the beginning of the war. He had no doubt the hon. Gentleman had received such accounts; but he did not believe a word of them. Nothing but the most audacious cooking of accounts could reduce the expenses of the war to that figure. He would much rather trust the estimate made by the hon. Member for Orkney (Mr. Laing), than whom there could be no better financial authority. He acquitted the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India of all blame of cooking accounts; but there was another point in regard to which he could not acquit him of blame. That was with reference to the salt tax. His Predecessor had made a similar statement—that it had not been the object to raise the Revenue, but to equalize the Revenue in different parts of India. The hon. Gentleman must have a very short memory indeed. A Budget was produced in India, the object of which avowedly was to establish a considerable increase in the total amount of Revenue to be received from the salt of the people of India; there was a large increase in the salt revenue, to produce a Famine Fund, and that increase was actually imposed.

MR. E. STANHOPE: £300,000 was subsequently given up, so that really there was no increase whatever.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he was quite aware of that. It was the result of a debate in that House, in which very strong opinions were expressed; and the Government did give up the spoil they attempted to appropriate at the expense of the poor ryots of India. It was, therefore, somewhat audacious in the hon. Gentleman to take the high tone he did, as if the Government had never attempted to raise the salt tax revenue. He was disappointed that the hon. Gentleman had, in such decided terms, refused to concede anything to the proposal of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett). He had not only refused the Committee, but he held out no hope of granting it in the future. It appeared to him (Sir George Campbell) that the hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff) and the Under Secretary of State for India were agreed between themselves to oppose this Resolution as both holding the English official view. If arguments were wanted to show the necessity of a Committee, the Under Secretary of State for India himself had supplied them. He told them that the Duke of Argyll, as Secretary of State, took one view of the Act of 1858, and that Lord Cairns took a diametrically opposite view; that the relations between the Secretary of State and his Council could not be defined, and yet that practically the system worked well; but he (Sir George Campbell) had a very decided opinion that it did not work well. He was the only Member in the House, he believed, who had been a Member of the Council of India, and he regretted that the Government had decided on their line of policy before they had heard him. A period of more than 20 years had elapsed since the Act for the Government of India was passed, and it was time that a Committee should inquire into the radical change which then was made. Comparisons had been made between the government of India under the East India Company and the present system of government; but the advantage was, in many respects, by no means in favour of the present system. A great Debt was, no doubt, accumulated during the time of the Mutiny; but the East India Company was not fairly chargeable with it. As regarded the favourable side of the administration of the East India Company, he could not help thinking that it operated very beneficially as a check upon the Board of Control, and that it possessed other and very considerable advantages. The members of the Company lived, as it were, in a glass house;

they were afraid that their authority might be abolished, and they were, on that account, particularly cautious, especially in their treatment of the Services under them. They presented to them a firm front; whereas nowadays he regretted to observe an inclination to yield to their demands, with what seemed to him to be somewhat excessive liberality. The East India Company, moreover, were an independent body, and were able to resist pressure such as that which was so frequently brought to bear on Members of that House. As to public works, the great system of railways was instituted under the régime of the Company, while, as a financial body, it was infinitely superior to the Council of India, and was able more thoroughly to check the construction of imprudent works. Besides, the Council of India carried on its proceedings in absolute privacy; and nothing, he imagined, could have a more depressing effect on any man than that his advice and arguments on any particular question should be altogether concealed from the public. In fact, the position of members of Council appeared to be gradually approaching that of permanent clerks, thus showing a great misapprehension of their position, tending, in his opinion, to produce very injurious results. There was, moreover, he was sorry to perceive, a growing disposition to govern India by telegrams and private communications, which was calculated to have the effect of completely checkmating the Council. That system had increased by "leaps and bounds" under the government of Lord Lytton; so that in a late important correspondence there occurred an important hiatus of 15 or 18 months, with respect to which there was not a scrap of Correspondence furnished to the House, although there must have been communications between the Indian and the Home Governments during that time. There was a growing tendency on the part of the Government in India, too, to claim to mark as secret and confidential any despatches it might write; but it was not, he believed, ever intended by Parliament that it should have that power. He had, up to the present time, treated the subject before the House on general grounds with reference to that question of administration; but directing his observations specially to finance, he must say he strongly felt that no sufficient check was exercised either by the Council of India, or by Parliament over it; while he thought it was absolutely necessary that such a check should be exercised over so large a Revenue as was raised in India. The construction of the Act was a matter on which the greatest difference existed. It was impossible to say what power the Council had and what power it had not. By means of telegrams, private letters, and political despatches sent to India, the power of the Council was evaded. In reality, the authority of the Council was vain, illusory, and dormant. It exercised no effective control whatever. In no case of a serious expenditure of the Revenues of India did the Council exercise control. He had known many cases in which a large portion—in fact, a great majority—of the members of the Council were opposed to a certain expenditure; but he had never heard of a single case in which they had succeeded in arresting that expenditure. The Secretary of State possessed immense power. Some members of the Council were old, and some not so old. Some of the members were men of independent minds, and some were subject to influence. The general result was, that a man of great position and power like the Secretary of State was able to have his own way. There were various means by which he could have his way by hook or by crook. If he did not get a majority, he had the power of withdrawing the proposition, to bring it forward some other day when he could get a majority. Her Majesty's Ministers were able at their discretion to expend the finances of India, and he thought it was well worth inquiry whether some improved method might not be devised. Then, going to India, he had seen a good deal of the Government of India, and he was bound to say the Government in that country was not equal to the task of a continuous and systematic administration of the finances of India. Just as men acquired a good deal of experience they went out of office, and they had not that settled and continuous policy which they would have were the members of the Government more settled. In reality, too much power rested with the Governor General himself; everything was too much dependent on his individual will and character. It seemed to him that the Council of the Governor General did not always contain men of the same independence as it did generations ago; nor were the Governors General men of the same calibre as the Governors General of former days. Great oscillations of policy took place. He could not imagine a greater contrast between the character of the late Governor General, Lord Northbrook, and that of the present Governor General, Lord Lytton. In former days the Company exercised independence with regard to the appointment of the members of the Council, but now-a-days the Council was a good deal packed. Though some of the members were very able men, they might also have some who were pretty much of the opinion of the Governor General, and amenable to his influence. In old days members of the Council received a higher salary than any Deputy or Lieutenant Governor, and there was no promotion for members of the Council. They were men over whom the Governor General had no control whatever. Now-a-days the members of the Council received less salary, and there were high posts in the gift of the Governor General, which were more highly paid than a membership of the Council, and to which the members of Council looked for promotion. That had, to a considerable degree, undermined the independence of the members of the Council. They had, besides, men sent out for special work, and those men, not having strong opinions beyond their own special Department, were generally controlled by the Governor General and went with him. The result was, the Governors General were usually enabled to carry out the principle of divide et impera. Very great questions had to be dealt with. During the last 20 years very great changes had taken place in India. The Natives had been educated, and the consequence was that a Native Free Press had sprung up. The mode of dealing with Native Independent States was vacillating and uncertain, and there was a growing tendency upon the part of those States to set themselves in opposition to the Government, though at present this opposition had only shown itself mainly in newspaper articles. As to the Army, he did not see the means of effecting a reduction of the Army by which India could be saved from bankruptcy, as every important question in regard to its constitution had to be considered. As regarded the Civil Service, he must say he only gleaned knowledge of some defects of that Service after he had left it. He was inclined to think that there were some great evils in connection with it, especially in reference to the system by which men in that Service were so long kept in one particular groove, so that they were prevented from acquiring general knowledge of men and things. He thought a great deal ought to be done for India in the matter of agriculture which they did not require the Government to do in this country. In the great and growing interests of India it was necessary that the strongest tribunal that it was possible to obtain should look into these matters and try to ascertain, not only whether the machinery of government was now sufficient, but whether, in the great changes taking place, there was a Government calculated to promote the permanent welfare of India in the future.

MR. O'DONNELL rose to express his intention to vote with the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett). At the same time, he must say he was strongly convinced that all the propositions for getting more control over the expenditure of the Indian Revenues were perfectly illusory. He was only too much afraid that nothing short of a great catastrophe in India would recall this House to a sense of its responsibilities. From year to year the control of the House of Commons over their great dependencies was becoming more and more nominal, and the House was becoming more and more a mere recording office. The Minister of a particular Department imposed his will on the House, and very often he was really less morally responsible for what went on in his Department than any other Member of the House. India was at that moment separated from this country by a wider gulf of misunderstanding and discontent than at any former period. Every class in India was discontented, and every class had reason to be discontented. There was plenty of good-will towards India in the Service and among the Government officials; but, somehow, routine, red-tapeism, and all the obstacles which laid between the real consideration of India and the intelligence and good-will of the House, prevented anything like the application of a real remedy for the evils under which the people of India laboured. It was all very well for ex-officials to speak disparagingly of Native criticism, the hostility of the Native Press, and the antagonism between the Native Governments and the British Government. In his opinion, they ought to go beyond those expressions of Native discontent to the grievances which lay beneath. It had been mentioned on both sides of the House, and by the leading organs of both Parties, that they must reduce the armies of the Native Princes. These Princes were, no doubt, firmly convinced that their own stability was bound up with the stability of British Rule in India, and they and many other classes in Indian society were loyal to the British Government for the best of all reasons—namely, that that they feared a far worse state of things would follow if that Rule were removed. But every class was so badly off, Native industry was so oppressed, every description of Native capacity was so heavily handicapped, the cultivators were so ground down by taxation, which was stupid still more than unjust, the artizans were so worried by the licence tax, Zemindars were so offended by our violations of the Perpetual Settlement, and neighbouring States were so alarmed by continual threats of interference, that amidst the uncertainty and growing disbelief in the promises of the Government, which their stagey Imperialism had excited, the bonds of loyalty were growing weaker and weaker, owing to the meddling and muddling, and blundering and blustering, and promising and never-performing policy of the Government. This House had no means of getting at Indian opinion except in a roundabout manner, and if they did not remedy that, they would reap the usual fruits of ignorance. He believed that the only control which could be exercised over the expenditure of the Revenues of India would have to be exercised by the representatives of Native opinion themselves. This House must face the problem of giving representation to India. He was not going to say what form that representation must have; but some bodies must be recognized which would give the House of Commons a mirror in which they might see the drift of genuine Native opinion. Every year that they neglected that they approached, if not a catastrophe, at least a serious danger. And the catastrophe might arise at any moment. Take the question of the reduction of Native Armies. The Native Princes might refuse to reduce them, and they would at once be in the midst of a crisis. He did not attribute to Government an immediate intention of that kind; but this House had such a want of real control over Indian affairs, that they might find themselves embarked in a war with the Native States in India without so much as a week's notice. They had a war in South Africa, and yet they received assurances up to the close of last Session of a most optimist character. It might be the same with regard to India. How not to do it, seemed to be the rule in regard to India, and it would continue to be so until Parliament determined to have a share in the control of the country commensurate with its responsibility.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I think before we actually divide, I ought to say one or two words upon the view which Her Majesty's Government takes of the proposition of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett). I think no question could be more serious or difficult than that of the relations which should exist between the Governments of the United Kingdom and of India. We have confided to us the administration of one of the largest and most heterogeneous Empires that the world has ever seen, and of all the Members of that Imperial family whose interest we have to consider, there is none more interesting, and none which presents problems of greater delicacy and difficulty, than the great Empire of India. I fully grant that the question is one deservingly claiming attention from time to time at the hands of the Government and of Parliament, and also that great advantages arose under the old system from the Inquiries which used to take place before the Committees of the House before the Charters of the East India Company were renewed. Those periodical Inquiries gave fair and natural opportunity for investigating the whole conduct of the business of our Indian Empire, alike as to defects which existed, and remedies which might be applied. I have no doubt that the great Committees to which the hon. Member for Hackney referred deserved the encomia which he passed upon them; but there is some little difference between what I may call the natural opportunities which the expiry of the Charters of the East India Company afforded for inquiry, and that which the hon. Member now proposes to create. The Inquiries made in former days were called for by the circumstances of the case, and were entered upon by our forefathers without any special charges being made against the Administration of the day. They were not tinged with anything in the nature of political difference or criticism, but were Inquiries which naturally took place when you were going to give a fresh lease of power to a Company who occupied a peculiar and a remarkable position. But we are now asked to institute an Inquiry with special reference to what the hon. Gentleman describes as a defect in the control now exercised over the Government of India. Further, the Committee for which the hon. Gentleman asks is not to be appointed in order to institute a mere general Inquiry as to the condition of affairs, but is to start with the foregone conclusion that there is something wrong in the control we now exercise over the Government of India, coupled with the assumption that the finances of the Empire are in a state of great embarrassment, if not of alarming danger. The hon. Member for Orkney (Mr. Laing) has addressed a very interesting speech to the House; but his argument was simply directed to show that the finances of India are in such a state that, unless something be done promptly, the Government would speedily find themselves confronted with a danger such as we have never seen in that part of the world. If that is the sort of reason for appointing this Committee, we must ask the nature of the dangers with which we are likely to be confronted, before we can form any opinion as to the remedy which the Committee may be expected to afford. The hon. Member for Orkney said he considered the real advantage of the Committee would arise from the fact that it would educate Her Majesty's Ministers; but if that is so, its office must be not so much to consider the possibility of providing a better control of Indian finance, as to inquire into the way in which this and former Governments have managed the affairs of the Empire since the passing of the Act of 1858. That is a large question, and one which might be discussed with advantage; but I doubt very much whether a Committee of this House, appointed as is now proposed, would be the best means of carrying on such an Inquiry. We have been told that in considering the financial position of India, we ought to inquire as to larger questions of policy as well as of detail, and to ask how far the policy which has been pursued has tended to bring about the state of things complained of. The hon. Member for Orkney, having proved to his own satisfaction that the Revenue of India was absolutely inelastic, proceeded to consider the manner in which the expenditure could be reduced, and from the premises he laid down, deduced the conclusion that the whole matter turned upon a reduction of the Army, which could alone bring about an equilibrium. But, if that course were adopted, it would give rise to great questions of policy with regard to our Frontier neighbours and the Native States within our own Dominions, and would, in fact, raise many points with which I think no Committee of this House would be competent to deal—certainly, not a Committee appointed upon the basis suggested by the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney. I wish to lay down what I consider to be a cardinal principle in all our dealings with India. I think the cardinal principle on which we ought to go is this—that we ought to concentrate authority where we intend to fix responsibility. If you impose on a particular body in the State responsibility for the administration of your affairs, you must give full power to that body. And from that I think we come to a distinction between two classes of Indian affairs. We sin, I think, very often in both directions when we come to matters of expenditure which are not properly left to the administration of the local authority—for these are responsible, not the Government in India, but the Government of the Secretary of State also. I treat the whole of the Indian Administration for that purpose as one. But when you deal with matters which properly belong to the local or Indian authority, then you ought to be careful how Parliament interferes with the authority you have set up. On the other hand, when you deal with matters which properly belong to the Imperial authority, then you must take care that you do not allow your local authority to interfere with you, or to impede the authority you mean to hold responsible. As an illustration, I might mention the case of salaries or retiring allowances to Civil servants—in matters of that sort, we all agree in theory that these are matters which ought not to be dealt with by the Imperial Parliament, but by some Indian authority. What do we do now? In point of fact, we constantly say that Indian matters are not of general interest, and do not attract much attention in this House. Very often I admit they do not; but very frequently, when a grievance arises which interests a certain number of hon. Members, then we find a comparatively large number coming down to the House; they fight the cause intrusted to them—they make out the cause intrusted to them—in the name, perhaps, of some individual who thinks he has not been properly treated by the Indian Government. Well, an official replies for the Indian Office, and he is aided very likely by some ex-official Members, but they receive, comparatively, little support; and very often Resolutions and Votes are passed in this House which have a tendency to impose burdens upon India in matters to which we have little or nothing to say. These may be small matters, but they sometimes extend to even larger matters. The hon. Member for Orkney (Mr. Laing), and others, have referred to questions connected with the Army in India; and he has said, with truth, that arrangements made some years ago with India in respect of the amalgamation of the Army and the formation of Staff corps led to considerable expense. Well, Sir, that was because from time to time different pleas were brought forward in Parliament on behalf of the officers of the Army, and one concession after another was wrung from India by the action of Parliament. And, therefore, if you are going to consider this whole question with a view to establish a system of administration, such as will give fair play to India and prevent too much pressure being put upon her resources, you will have to see how you can control the action of Parliament in matters in which Parliament ought not to interfere. There is a very great distinction indeed between the position of the Government intrusted with Indian affairs and the old East India Company. It has been said, and a serious danger. And the catastrophe might arise at any moment. Take the question of the reduction of Native Armies. The Native Princes might refuse to reduce them, and they would at once be in the midst of a crisis. He did not attribute to Government an immediate intention of that kind; but this House had such a want of real control over Indian affairs, that they might find themselves embarked in a war with the Native States in India without so much as a week's notice. They had a war in South Africa, and yet they received assurances up to the close of last Session of a most optimistic character. It might be the same with regard to India. How not to do it, seemed to be the rule in regard to India, and it would continue to be so until Parliament determined to have a share in the control of the country commensurate with its responsibility.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I think before we actually divide, I ought to say one or two words upon the view which Her Majesty's Government takes of the proposition of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett). I think no question could be more serious or difficult than that of the relations which should exist between the Governments of the United Kingdom and of India. We have confided to us the administration of one of the largest and most heterogeneous Empires that the world has ever seen, and of all the Members of that Imperial family whose interest we have to consider, there is none more interesting, and none which presents problems of greater delicacy and difficulty, than the great Empire of India. I fully grant that the question is one deservingly claiming attention from time to time at the hands of the Government and of Parliament, and also that great advantages arose under the old system from the Inquiries which used to take place before the Committees of the House before the Charters of the East India Company were renewed. Those periodical Inquiries gave fair and natural opportunity for investigating the whole conduct of the business of our Indian Empire, alike as to defects which existed, and remedies which might be applied. I have no doubt that the great Committees to which the hon. Member for Hackney referred deserved the encomia which he passed upon them; but there is some little difference between what I may call the natural opportunities which the expiry of the Charters of the East India Company afforded for inquiry, and that which the hon. Member now proposes to create. The Inquiries made in former days were called for by the circumstances of the case, and were entered upon by our forefathers without any special charges being made against the Administration of the day. They were not tinged with anything in the nature of political difference or criticism, but were Inquiries which naturally took place when you were going to give a fresh lease of power to a Company who occupied a peculiar and a remarkable position. But we are now asked to institute an Inquiry with special reference to what the hon. Gentleman describes as a defect in the control now exercised over the Government of India. Further, the Committee for which the hon. Gentleman asks is not to be appointed in order to institute a mere general Inquiry as to the condition of affairs, but is to start with the foregone conclusion that there is something wrong in the control we now exercise over the Government of India, coupled with the assumption that the finances of the Empire are in a state of great embarrassment, if not of alarming danger. The hon. Member for Orkney (Mr. Laing) has addressed a very interesting speech to the House; but his argument was simply directed to show that the finances of India are in such a state that, unless something be done promptly, the Government would speedily find themselves confronted with a danger such as we have never seen in that part of the world. If that is the sort of reason for appointing this Committee, we must ask the nature of the dangers with which we are likely to be confronted, before we can form any opinion as to the remedy which the Committee may be expected to afford. The hon. Member for Orkney said he considered the real advantage of the Committee would arise from the fact that it would educate Her Majesty's Ministers; but if that is so, its office must be not so much to consider the possibility of providing a better control of Indian finance, as to inquire into the way in which this and former Governments have managed the affairs of the Empire since the passing of the Act of 1858. That is a large question, and one which might be discussed with advan-

that there had been no hindrance to the Government in the strengthening and restoration of their position, he thought the Government were bound to give the House some satisfaction that the future policy to be pursued would cease to be a policy of selfish aggrandizement—a policy of inhuman butchery of the Native population. In the latest news from South Africa they had been given the glad assurance that the colours of the 24th Regiment had been rescued; but there was another item of information which ought to bring the blush of shame to the cheek of any man with a spark of humanity in his breast. They read of the destruction of a Native kraal and the burning down of 250 Native huts. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies, if he intended to propose that some decoration ought to be established to reward that branch of the Indian Service which consisted in the burning down of Native huts? temporary embarrassment to him of the to turn back to the speech made of a Robert Peel made in 1842. I have believed referred to it for many years, but I could collect that he pointed out to the House what might happen if the time should arise when there would be great confusion and embarrassment in the finances of India, and to what an enormous and perilous extent a disturbance in the finances of India might affect the finances of this country. We have approached the time that Sir Robert Peel referred to, and I recollect that people thought when he spoke he was going too far away to find an argument in favour of the great change which he was anxious to make for the purpose of restoring the financial equilibrium of the country. We have come now to that point and, I say, that, listening to this debate, in which I had not the least intention of taking any part, I have been impressed with the seriousness of the position in which we are placed, and I am astounded that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who does know his multiplication table—I think I have known Ministers who did not—who was brought up at the feet of my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich, and who, if he were not on that Bench, would in many financial questions agree with him—I am astounded, I say, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have given his consent to the recent policy of

VALUATION OF PROPERTY BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time said, he thought he would best consult the wishes of the House by not repeating his arguments of last year in favour of the measure. It was substantially the same measure which had been read a second time last year, and some of the most important portions of which, up to the 17th or 18th clauses, had gone through Committee. The Government had, within the last few years, given more in aid of local expenditure; a local Budget was now brought before the House annually; increasing interest was being taken in local taxation and expenditure; and for those, as well as for many other reasons, it was extremely desirable that a uniform system of valuation should be established not only in every Union, but also throughout every county—especially seeing that in the course of a short time the county rate would have to contribute towards certain local charges. While the Bill had year after year been criticised by some of the most experienced and experienced committees in the Kingdom, was always given him the benefit of their advice and assistance, and by the greater India could not have been only underdozen members, but earnestly desired who are appointed become law. Since and who are, and have been under the notice than two years. Indeed, the rules which a Governor General the guidance of future not more than five years more and more for the first year. The law as it stood, learning the business to a great extent one of You have a Governor General, a great deal of never been in India having now passed ment, who had no notion, he felt confident, who had nothing to do with the House, directly or indirectly alterations in the of England. go, and also lay bare its vices—for I think they are many—so far as they go. I would therefore ask the Government whether it is worth while for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to get up to-night and give us the sort of speech which he has made? It differs from the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for India. He was, I may almost say, loud in contrast with the hon. Gentlemen who have spoken on this side of the House. We might have supposed that the old times had come back, when we had members of the East India Company speaking as if nothing could be more prosperous than the condition of India. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has confined his remarks almost entirely to the question of the relationship between the Secretary of State and the Council; but when he approached the end of his speech he was obliged to admit that the time has nearly come when it would be very desirable to have such an Inquiry as the House instituted during the existence of the Company. In 1853 there was a Committee of this very kind. I was not on it, though I believe I took more interest in the question than any other hon. Member of the House at that time. The object of the Committee was to get an agreement that the Company should be continued, and I recollect that the then responsible authority in this House made a speech one night five hours long. He rose at 5 o'clock and spoke until 10 o'clock, and during the whole five hours his language was one continued eulogy of the East India Company. I succeeded him, and I spoke till 12. Sir Charles Wood, the then President of the Board of Control, and myself, in fact, occupied the whole evening. I thought that I had answered his speech, but the House of Commons did not agree with me. And yet what happened? In five minutes the whole of the eulogy was blown to the winds. The President of the Board of Control, his Colleagues, and almost everybody else, admitted that the East India Company itself was an absurdity and an antiquated arrangement which could not be continued any longer. The moment the Mutiny broke out the India Company was at once got rid of. Some hon. Members, who do not know so much of the subject as I have known, have been talking as if the India Company were something that might be well worth resuscitating. For my part, I do not believe we shall ever again have anything like it. Although there is much to blame in the present system of government in India, that Government has done a great many things of great advantage to India which the India Company never attempted; and which, if it had attempted, it would have failed in accomplishing. I recollect charging Mr. Mangles and Sir James Hogg, then in this House, with this fact, that in 14 years, according to their own Returns, the India Company had not expended so much on roads, bridges, and permanent works as the Corporation of the City of Manchester, with 350,000 or 400,000 of inhabitants, had expended in the same time for the advantage of their population. The East India Company fell as it deserved to fall, and I am sorry that its successor has not been more fortunate than it has been. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, during a great portion of his speech, argued as if there were really no case for Inquiry, and then towards the end he seemed to relent somewhat, and feel that he was not sure of his ground, and to give more hope that at some not remote period he would consent to some kind of Inquiry. I think that if there is to be an Inquiry, it cannot come a day too soon. Reference has been made, in the course of the debate, to the prospect of a Dissolution. I presume that there will be a Dissolution in the course of this year. That has been the usual Constitutional course ever since the Septennial Act was passed. ["No, no!"] I see there is an hon. Gentleman on the other side who is very much afraid of a Dissolution. We are not afraid of a Dissolution on this side, and I have no doubt that many hon. Gentlemen on the other side are not afraid. If there is to be an Inquiry, the sooner we have it the better, because these misfortunes that we see before us, not looming in the distance, but close upon us, are growing greater almost every day, and Parliament cannot one day too soon apply its mind and its utmost attention to the great and grave difficulties which are before us. Recollect what you have done in India. According to the statement of my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), you extract from the people of India everything that can be extracted with safety; you do not know where you can turn for another tax of the smallest amount; you have put on a licence tax, which is in point of fact an income tax, upon a man having no more income than 4s. a-week; your salt tax is, I suppose, 2,000 per cent upon the ordinary common cost of salt, and having done all this, you have borrowed so much that you cannot borrow any more. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has offered to lend, or rather he has suggested that he will lend—and I suppose he is meditating it as he meditated the Rhodope Grant—to the Indian Government £2,000,000, for which the Indian Government is to pay no interest. That is exactly the terms upon which the people of this country lent to the Turkish Government. These terms were not in the agreement, but that has been the result. The money has been lent, and no interest paid. We call the Turkish Government bankrupt; but we say that the Indian Government is only in a position of momentary and temporary embarrassment. I ask you to turn back to the speech which Sir Robert Peel made in 1842. I have not referred to it for many years, but I recollect that he pointed out to the House what might happen if the time should arise when there would be great confusion and embarrassment in the finances of India, and to what an enormous and perilous extent a disturbance in the finances of India might affect the finances of this country. We have approached the time that Sir Robert Peel referred to, and I recollect that people thought when he spoke he was going too far away to find an argument in favour of the great change which he was anxious to make for the purpose of restoring the financial equilibrium of the country. We have come now to that point and, I say, that, listening to this debate, in which I had not the least intention of taking any part, I have been impressed with the seriousness of the position in which we are placed, and I am astounded that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who does know his multiplication table—I think I have known Ministers who did not—who was brought up at the feet of my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich, and who, if he were not on that Bench, would in many financial questions agree with him—I am astounded, I say, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have given his consent to the recent policy of the Government in India, which must aggravate to an extent which we cannot measure, the great malady which affects that country at this moment. There is no doubt whatever that the policy which the Government have adopted within the last six months—a policy in which they have given up and repudiated the wisdom of our wisest Indian administrators—must aggravate to an enormous extent the disasters which have overtaken Indian finance and the difficulties with which this House is now called upon to grapple. I think the Government ought to have received the proposition of the hon. Member for Hackney with sympathy and with an offer of assistance. They might have objected to his words and suggested something better; but, now that the question has been brought before the House and seriously discussed, I think they ought to have consented to a Committee which should have given a thorough investigation into all the troubles which now beset the question of Indian finance. I do not ask for a Committee entirely on the ground of finance. My opinion is, as I have already said, that nothing which you can do here can materially affect the question of finance. That question is one which arises in India, and must be determined in India. I have come to the conclusion I stated here in 1858, that it was absolutely impossible—and years are proving it to be impossible—that India could be managed by a half-a-dozen members of the Indian Council, who are appointed only for five years, and who are, on the average, not more than two years and a-half in office, with a Governor General at their head who is not more than five years in office, and is for the first year or two, in a manner, learning the business of his great office. You have a Governor General who had never been in India before his appointment, who had never been in this House, who had never been connected directly or indirectly with the politics of England. You have half-a-dozen such gentlemen as I have described, presided over by such a Governor General, undertaking to manage the whole affairs of 200,000,000 of persons, of 20 different nations, speaking 20 different languages; and to say that such a thing can be done by half-a-dozen gentlemen sitting in Calcutta, with such a Governor General at their head, is to make of assessing mineral property. He was unable to understand why that description of property was excluded from the Bill, unless it was that the President of the Local Government Board sympathized with land valuers and that class of persons. The present system was very unsatisfactory and unjust. He would vote against the second reading of the Bill, unless his right hon. Friend promised to introduce a clause dealing with the matter he had mentioned.

MR. RYLANDS said, that the changes introduced in the Bill removed, to a considerable extent, the objections which had been taken to the Bill of last year. The subject to which the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Knowles) had referred might be considered in Committee, and he would second his hon. Friend in the matter. He objected to the Amendment, because it raised the question of the incidence of the Income and Property Tax by a side wind. He hoped the House would be disposed some day to deal with that subject in a serious spirit; but he was not prepared to raise that question at the present moment. He would vote for the second reading of the Bill, trusting that certain changes might be made in its clauses in Committee.

MR. STORER pointed out that there was an unjust incident of taxation as between the urban and the rural occupier which ought to be remedied. As an illustration of the grievance, he might mention that a farmer in the neighbourhood of a town with which he was acquainted occupied a farm at a rent of £400 a-year, and derived an income from it of £200 per annum, yet he contributed exactly the same sum to the local rates as certain large works in the town, which were let at £400 a-year but returned many thousands annually.

MR. STANSFELD said, the only fault he had to find with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. J. G. Hubbard) was for introducing his Motion on the second reading of this Bill. The subject was a remanet of the late Government's questions, and had been introduced in successive Sessions, and always been postponed. It was essentially a Bill of clauses, and he thought the House would be of opinion that it was not desirable to spend any great length of time in discussing it at that stage. The hon. Member for South Nottinghamshire

(Mr. Storer), who had just sat down, seemed to him to be labouring under a delusion as to the objects of the Bill. The question of rating did not arise in the debate on a matter of valuation. The question for the House, at that moment, was solely the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman, and he would forgive him (Mr. Stansfeld), he trusted, when he suggested that that Amendment was really irrelevant to the Question then before the House, because the right hon. Gentleman had fallen into precisely the same error as the hon. Member who had preceded him. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London was of opinion that the taxes ought to be made upon the same value as the rates. Whether that value should be the gross value or the rateable value was another question. But the Bill did not affect that question in the slightest degree. It was a Bill to fix upon an uniform system for assessing the gross and rateable value of property, and it left the question raised by the right hon. Gentleman entirely intact as to whether income tax should be levied upon rateable value or upon the gross, as was the case at the present moment. According to the present law, the income tax was levied upon the gross value of property. He did not deny that that mode frequently pressed unduly, but he did deny that that was the proper occasion to discuss the justice of that principle. The right hon. Gentleman ought to regard this stage of the Bill as a preliminary to the occasion when he would have every opportunity of bringing forward his views. This Bill would ascertain the gross value and the rateable value of property, and the right hon. Gentleman could not object to the proposal of the Government that those gross and rateable values should be arrived at in some uniform manner. It appeared to him that the sole objection to the second reading of the Bill was a matter which did not properly arise in the debate on that question, and, therefore, he hoped the House would accord the Bill a second reading.

MR. PELL said, he could not support the Amendment—one reason being that he thought the Bill had been sufficiently discussed. He entirely agreed with the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Stansfeld) that they would do better to defer further discussion until the proper time—namely, when the Bill went into charged income tax on £2,000, and recouping himself to the extent of £1,600, was practically paying on his residue twice as heavily as the capitalist mortgagee. While commending a remedy for this grievance to the attention of the House, he could not but remark that this unfair proposal in the 31st clause was thrust into the Bill by the Inland Revenue Department. The President of the Local Government Board was the victim of that Department. He did not want to take away from the receipts of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; he wished to see the tax levied equitably. He charged Somerset House with being over-zealous in an ungodly attempt to lay burdens on the backs of landowners and house owners. When this House passed the Inhabited House Duty, it gave to the Revenue officers the privilege of assessing an annual value, and when they voted an income tax it was to be assessed on the profits of lands and houses. He wanted to know whether a man with £2,000 a-year in house property, who only got £1,500 a-year from it, should be dealt with as if he had £2,000 a-year profits? If he did not get the £2,000, they had no right to tax him on that amount. In 1860 the population was 19,900,000; now it was 24,800,000—an increase of 25 per cent. The house duty in 1860 was £23,000,000 odd; it was now £47,000,000 odd. The houses chargeable with income tax in 1860 amounted to £48,780,000, and in 1878 to £90,451,000 in value. What did that mean? It did not mean that houses had increased in that proportion or numbers, for that increase could not exceed the growth of the population; but it meant that the assessable value had been forced up 75 per cent in 18 years by the combined efforts of assessment committees and tax surveyors. He would close his appeal to the House by a warning. Many years since this country, in the Great War, had to struggle for existence, and in order to pay our way we issued paper money so lavishly that it greatly depreciated in value, and the issues of the Bank of England fell to a discount of 25 per cent. Attempts were made by Lord King and others to protect themselves against this depreciation in the currency, but the attempts were disapproved by the Government; and Mr. Vansittart introduced a Bill into the House of Commons, which was passed into law, enacting that the bank note was equal in value to the coin it represented, and that any persons giving or taking it at any but its nominal value should be guilty of a misdemeanor. This clause, despite the earnestness of Horner and the eloquence of Canning, became law, under the influence of the Government and its followers. The proposal in the Valuation Bill was not less mischievous and absurd, and he asked the House whether they would tolerate such another anomaly in legislation? The proposal in the 31st clause was as absurd and intolerable as that of Mr. Vansittart, and it was infinitely more injurious? It would inflict on the people a grievance which stirred them up against the Government they ought to respect and the laws they ought to obey, and made taxpaying a nuisance, instead of what it ought to be—a pleasure. He begged to move the Amendment which stood in his name.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA, in seconding the Amendment, said, he opposed the Bill for the reasons so clearly stated by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hubbard) who had proposed the Amendment, and also on the ground that if such a measure were applied to Ireland, it would work still greater injustice, and therefore, lest he might be accused hereafter when a Bill was introduced for Ireland, that he had allowed the principle to pass unchallenged on the present occasion. He considered the principle of charging income and rates on the scale adopted hitherto and continued by this Bill unjust; and, therefore, he felt called upon to oppose its application to England.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "no Valuation Bill, providing in a Valuation List a common authority for the assessment of rates and taxes, can be satisfactory unless it provide a common measure of value for such assessment by levying Imperial taxes as well as local rates upon the rateable value,"—(Mr. Hubbard),

—instead thereof,

Gentleman opposite (Mr. Stansfeld) that they would do better to defer further discussion until the proper time—namely, when the Bill went into Committee. He must say also that he regarded the Amendment with some suspicion; for, in his own mind, he did not see that it was one which would recommend itself to the owners of real property. The effect of the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment would be to entirely disorganize and unsettle the existing arrangements for the assessment of real property. There was one point upon which he felt some regret, because the subject was rather a "hobby" of his. He was sorry to see that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Slater-Booth) had not done anything for the better assessment of railways. There was a clause in the Bill, truly, which authorized the calling in of a professional man in those cases; but it was very obvious that railway property had now become so enormous and important that it could hardly be assessed in the same way as ordinary property. He could not help thinking, therefore, that opportunities should be given to call in a professional valuer who would make a professional survey of all railway property in his county, and thus afford substantial data on that subject, which, under present conditions, must be only a matter of conjecture.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT thought that they must congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board for having introduced this measure, framed as it was very much in accordance with the principles laid down last year in Committee. He sympathized with the right hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. J. G. Hubbard), and he thought the House generally sympathized with him in the Motion he had made; but he could not agree with his hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), who suggested that there was no necessity for bringing forward this question. The hon. Member knew perfectly well — probably no other hon. Member in the House knew so well — the difference between the assessment for the income tax, the county rate, and that for the poor rate. They were three distinct and different modes of assessment. Therefore, when the President of the Local Government Board brought in his Bill, which was to assimilate and place exactly on the same footing these different assessments, naturally his right hon.

Friend the Member for the City of London thought that was a fair opportunity for discussing that grievance of which he thought he had a right to complain. Though his right hon. Friend had a perfect right to bring forward this question, yet the second reading of this Bill was not the proper time to do so. ["No, no!"] He saw his right hon. Friend did not agree to that; but this question was essentially one for the Committee. He (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) was not going to argue that question; but he thought the suggestion thrown out by the hon. Member for South Leicestershire did deserve some consideration — namely, that whereas the income tax was levied upon the gross value, ought not the whole of the taxes to be levied upon the gross also? He believed it was so in Scotland, except as regarded the poor rate. But one thing he thought no one would deny — all these taxes ought for the future to be placed on the same footing. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had made an important statement on the question of rent. He believed that subject to be at the bottom of the Bill; for if rent was to be a criterion, they might depend upon getting very much nearer to the value of property than had ever been done before. What was wanted was to strengthen the hands of the county authorities so that the whole of these modes of assessment might be looked into, and thus enable them to place all the rates of the different Unions in the county on the same footing. What people objected to was the difference in the mode of assessment in the various Unions which now existed. He hoped his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board might have fair treatment in the consideration of the Bill. He certainly did not think these Bills — which were of very great interest to the counties and of very large importance — obtained a fair share of the time and attention of the House, and he also was of opinion that his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board did not obtain from the Government the opportunities accorded to other Departments, which the great and varied interest intrusted to his charge demanded.

MR. HIBBERT said, he did not agree that the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. J. G. Hubbard) was wrong in bringing forward his Amendment at the present time. He (Mr. Hibbert) was of opinion that it would have been entirely out of place in Committee, though he sympathized with the views of his right hon. Friend. He was sure no tax could be levied more unfairly and unjustly than a house and land tax upon the gross value. The question was one of great difficulty, for if the Amendment were carried, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be placed in a very awkward position in making an income tax upon England, Scotland, and Ireland, there being a different system of assessment in each Kingdom. He should like to see the whole matter as affecting the three Kingdoms considered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with a view of placing the tax upon a much more fair and reasonable footing. The Amendment would only apply to England. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. G. Hubbard) would be satisfied with the discussion which had taken place, and not press the Amendment to a Division. There were some alterations which would make the Bill much more acceptable in Lancashire — namely, greater assessment boards were proposed to be left out. In Lancashire, which was thickly populated, the difficulty was not so much felt, but there were counties in which there were five or six greater assessment boards with five or six different authorities outside the county authorities, and it was impossible under those circumstances to have anything approaching uniformity. He had put down a Question the previous evening on the subject of the valuation of mines. Though he did not say it was a perfectly simple matter, he thought it would prove not so difficult as it was supposed to be. He trusted that when the Bill was in Committee his hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. Knowles) would introduce a plan on some definite system for valuing mines. At present in some counties there were three or four systems for valuing mines, which naturally gave rise to great difficulties in the assessment of that kind of property.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he would not trespass long on the patience of the House, but he thought there were two or three questions to which he might refer. He did not at all deny that he sympathized with the remarks of the hon. Member who had last spoken, but they must bear in mind that this Bill was not a final measure, but only a preliminary to one dealing with County Boards. The hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) raised a very serious question. If the hon. Gentleman thought he (Mr. Sclater-Booth) could settle this question of the rating of railways by a clause in a Valuation Bill, then the hon. Gentleman was a much more sanguine man than he. If every hon. Member representing a particular class of property were to bring forward a clause to provide for the special valuation of that property, he asked when was this Bill to pass? It would be extremely unfair towards the Bill. Let the Bill pass, however, and he should be most happy to produce a Rating Bill which would deal with all the questions not contained in this Bill. He trusted that after the debate on this question referring to England, the hon. Member (Mr. Ramsay) would not attempt to delay the progress of the measure.

MR. BIGGAR said, he was not informed whether the right hon. Member the Mover of the first Amendment would proceed with it or not. With regard to the Bill, he thought the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had tried to bring it forward on a former occasion, when he was counted out. That, of course, was very unpleasant; but now the right hon. Gentleman had placed hon. Members in that position that he was bound to get a hearing for the Motion. He could not imagine that any person could depend upon the principle that a ratepayer was bound to pay taxes on the actual value of that which he occupied or received rent for. As regarded rateable property, a fair and honest principle was that of a certain reduction from the gross value on account of the many different deductions which had to come off in proportion to the amount for waste. The result was under the former system, that in the case of the income tax an unfortunate occupier really paid from 20 to 50 per cent more than he actually put in his pocket. He could not believe that such a principle could be upheld, and he thought this was the opportunity for deciding the question as to whether the income tax should be paid on the gross value or on what the income really was. For that reason he thought the House would do well to support the Amendment.

MR. RAMSAY said, he should be very sorry to do anything in the way of obstruction; but he would state in a few words his objections to the Bill in its present form. He found that in this Bill there was no alteration of the existing law, under which it was admitted on all hands that the diversity of the rating was very great indeed. He thought that any plan which would make the principle the same in England as in Scotland would be an improvement. It was said that the circumstances were somewhat different in England; but he was not aware of any one principle of difference between the relations of property in England and those in Scotland. If a tenant took a farm, the rent payable was accepted as the sole criterion of value, and he was glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman say that he was prepared to accept rent as the real criterion. If an owner be the occupier in Scotland, then the rent was taken to be the letting value to a tenant. The Valuation Act of 1854 provided that occupiers and proprietors should be bound to give an account of the rent paid to the owner, and in that way each parish in Scotland was provided with a uniform system of valuation; but the result of the present law in England was that in every parish there was a different mode of assessment. The result of the passing of the Valuation Act for Scotland was that whereas in the 12 years preceding the passing of that Act the valuation of the county in which he resided had only increased £11,000, in the first valuation under the Act the increase was £34,000 in the one year. And it had continued to increase every year since, having advanced from £291,236 in 1855-6 to £449,082 in the year 1878-9. He had statistics on the subject, which, if time permitted, he should have wished to have brought before the attention of the House; but, under the circumstances, he would briefly state that he did not believe the Bill as it then stood would secure that uniform valuation which it was expected to do.

ASSIZES BILL.—[BILL 83.]

(Sir Matthew Ridley, Mr. Asheton Cross.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Bill read the third time accordingly.

Verbal Amendments made.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill do pass."—(Sir Matthew Ridley.)

MR. COLE, in moving the Adjournment of the Debate, said, that he should like to know the nature of the Amendments to be proposed. He had a strong objection to the Bill as it stood, and he opposed it on several grounds. It was supposed to be a great advantage to prisoners; but he certainly thought, in that respect, it was no advantage at all. Under the Bill, which grouped several counties, it was impossible for prisoners to bring their witnesses to the place where they were to be tried. For instance, prisoners were brought from the Land's End to be tried at Exeter, the result being that persons not having large means were completely debarred from bringing their witnesses up to the Assizes. That, he thought, was a very great hardship; and, instead of assisting prisoners, he thought it the reverse. If prisoners were obliged to bring up their witnesses from the extreme ends of the counties, then the expense of so doing ought to be paid by the Government. He should wish to move the insertion of a clause that it should be in the power and discretion of the Judges to allow the expenses of those witnesses. That was not so in the Bill, expenses only being allowed in the case of witnesses bound over by the committing justices. Again, why were jurymen taken from one county to try all the prisoners for three counties? It was very hard upon the sheriff of the county to have to provide for the trial of prisoners from three counties, instead of those from his own particular county, and it was also very hard upon the grand jurors of the county in which the Assizes was held. Then, again, another extraordinary provision was, that the sheriff of the county in which the trial was held had to attend the hanging of prisoners capitally convicted coming from the counties grouped with his own county. That was the effect of the section, which was very plain. The section said—

“Notwithstanding anything in the Act of 1877 where judgment of death has been passed on any convict at any assize, the judgment may be carried into effect in any prison in which the convict was confined for safe custody prior to his removal for trial and that the sheriff of the county for which such assizes were held shall be charged with the execution of that judgment, and shall for that purpose have the same jurisdiction and powers, and be subject to the same duties in the prison in which the judgment is to be carried into execution, although such prison is not situate within his county, as he has by law with respect to the common gaol of his county, or would have had if the Prison Act, 1865, and the Prison Act, 1877, had not passed.”

Therefore, the result was perfectly clear that if a prisoner was sentenced to be executed he returned to the prison within which he was confined before he was tried, and the sheriff attending the Assize had to be present at the execution. [Mr. ASSHETON CROSS dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary shook his head; but he (Mr. Cole) thought it was clear, on a proper construction of the section, that the sheriff of the county in which the Assizes were held for the three or four counties comprised within the group must attend the hanging of every prisoner from any and all of those counties. It was so, indeed; and he therefore submitted that that section required very careful consideration and amendment. He undertook to say that no lawyer could read that 3rd section without coming to his conclusion.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Debate be now adjourned.” —(Mr. Cole.)

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, the subject was of very great importance, and one which ought to be fully discussed by the House. He thought, however, the present was not a convenient opportunity for doing so. There was a necessity for the passing of the Bill on account of the Assizes to be held in April next, which, though intended for the trial of prisoners only, would be held in every county, unless the Bill became law before that time. He hoped, therefore, the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Cole) would withdraw his Amendment and allow the Bill to pass. The Home Secretary had promised that the House should have an opportunity of discussing the general question on a future occasion, which would be much better than to attempt to discuss a question of so much complication and importance on the third reading of a Bill intended to remedy a temporary difficulty. He thought the subject was worthy of the consideration of the House. He believed that in many counties grand jurors had made representations against the plan of holding four Assizes a-year, many of them saying three times were sufficient, while some thought two Assizes were sufficient in many places. While expressing no opinion on this question, he thought the mind of the country was not made up on the subject, and that the House should, therefore, have the opportunity for discussing the question in all its bearings.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he quite agreed with the remarks which had fallen from the hon. and learned Member who had last spoken (Mr. Morgan Lloyd). He thought that the whole question as to the holding of the Assizes was one on which the judgment of the House should be deliberately asked at some future Sitting. The arrangement, which at that moment was almost concluded, and had received the sanction of the Judges, was that the Assizes were fixed for the 22nd April, and that arrangement being settled for this year, at all events, the only question was whether the Judges were to go to every single place, although there might be only one or two prisoners, or whether the system which had hitherto been carried out, of grouping one or two counties together, should be adopted. Therefore, it would not be possible to take the general discussion upon the matter at the present time, though he quite agreed with the Mover of the adjournment as to the desirability of discussion. The Bill would never have been brought forward unless it had been to endeavour by it to avoid a great waste of time and trouble to all the sheriffs and Judges, who, if the Bill were not passed, would have to go to every town and Assize county. That being so, he hoped the House would consent to the third reading of the Bill, in order that the Government might be allowed to obtain an Order in Council for the settlement of the Assize in April as proposed. The only Amendment of the Bill was a practical one to insure the holding of two different Assizes in each separate county annually. The object of the 3rd clause was simply to provide for extreme cases. In some of the Welsh counties it was no longer thought necessary that there should be a gaol in each county capital—that was the general opinion of the Welsh counties. The sole object of the 3rd clause was to enable the sheriff of the county to which a condemned prisoner belonged, where there was no gaol, to attend the execution in the adjoining county where there was a gaol. Under the old system, the sheriff of the county to which the prisoner belonged, where there was no gaol, would not have had the right to attend the execution in the prison of an adjoining county under the new Prisons Act. The clause was simply intended to give the sheriff of the county to which the prisoner belonged the right of being present at the execution in whatever gaol to which the prisoner might be sent in default of there being a gaol in his own county. There was no intention, under the clause, to compel the attendance of the sheriffs of the county in which the Assizes were held at the execution of prisoners from foreign counties. If, however, on consideration it was found that the clause required any alteration the more clearly to express that view, he would see that some word should be inserted in the other House.

MR. HERSCHELL said, with reference to the groupings of counties, the system of taking adjoining counties, and grouping them, would, no doubt, be convenient for some people; but in some cases it would be more advantageous for everybody—prisoners included—to group them, not simply because they were adjoining counties, but with a due regard to the facilities of communication between the various Assize towns and districts.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, if he understood his hon. and learned Friend, his suggestion was that the groupings should be arranged on a basis of Bradshaw.

MR. COLE said, that after the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman, he would withdraw his Motion for the adjournment of the debate.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SELECT VESTRIES BILL.—[Bill 54.]
(Mr. James, Mr. Herschell, Mr. Joseph Cowen.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. W. H. JAMES, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that it provided for the nomination of the overseers of particular districts by any independent ratepayers in the place of the members of a customary vestry who were co-optatively elected. He had been anxious a year ago to obtain a Return from the Local Government Board, in order to show how many of these select vestries existed. The expense and difficulty in the way, however, were so great, as he was informed by the President of the Local Government Board, that he was unable to grant it. That select vestries were numerous, especially in the North of England, was notorious. The state of the law relative to the vestry and the overseer was extremely confused and anomalous. They originated at a time when the system of Local Government was entirely different to that of the present day. He was not prepared at that time of night to go into long statements; but wished to point out that it was a very considerable hardship where an overseer received his nomination from the members of a select vestry merely, the ratepayers having no voice in the matter. He knew of a particular instance where independent ratepayers attended at the sitting of a select vestry, and pointed out this injustice. Yet the nomination by the ratepayers in this case was refused by the chairman of the meeting. He did not think it fair that a matter which affected the ratepayers of a particular home parish should be decided by a self-elected body who often lived at a considerable distance. The origin of the select vestry by usage was at a time when the whole of their parochial affairs relating to civil government were in the hands of ecclesiastics. The hon. Member concluded by moving the second reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. James.)

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he was always reluctant to oppose a Bill promoted by a private Member, as he recognized the difficulties with which they were beset. At the same time, he thought this was an occasion on which the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. James) had not made out any real or very good case. No select vestries could nominate an overseer who was appointed by the magistrates. There was no law which allowed that. He could not gather from the remarks of the hon. Member the abuses to which he had referred, and his information was gained from the best authorities most likely to know. He was very reluctant to move that the Bill be read that day six months, as he hoped it would be withdrawn. He would therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Selater-Booth.)

MR. HERSCHELL said, his name was on the back of the Bill; but he was not aware that it was coming on that night. The abuse which he understood was complained of was in the case of a vestry not elected by the inhabitants, but self-elected, and where the power of nominating an overseer by a self-elected body was the same as that held by the vestry chosen by the inhabitants in the ordinary way.

Motion agreed to.

(Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Beresford Hope, Mr. Osborne Morgan, Sir Richard Wallace.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 21st February.]

(In the Committee.)

EARL PERCY said, he did not wish to revert to the causes of the Bill having been postponed; but it had been necessary to put down Amendments. It was perfectly impossible for them to consider that Bill carefully then, and have full discussion on points which should have been raised on the second reading. He really thought at that hour of the night they could not be expected to go into this lengthy subject. He would move that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Earl Percy.)

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, he saw no reason why they could not proceed.

He thought that a number of the Amendments were consequential Amendments—that was, if the first were disposed of, the others would follow. There would be a saving of much time if they proceeded, and he believed it would be in accordance with the convenience of hon. Members as it would avoid the necessity of bringing them on another occasion to the House on the subject.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, his noble Friend (Earl Percy) had no intention to obstruct; but gainsayers might misinterpret him, and say that under his guidance this Bill was becoming itself an ancient monument. He thought that the Committee might well go on, considering how the House had been most suspiciously counted out of late.

MR. MACARTNEY said, they had latterly had some good advice from the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope); but he (Mr. Macartney) would venture to impress upon the House that if they went into the consideration of the Bill, and if the Amendments were argued at the length they ought to be, they would be met with cries of "Divide, divide!"

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 38; Noes 54: Majority 16.—(Div. List, No. 31.)

Clause 1 (Definitions) agreed to.

Clause 2 (Appointment of Commissioners).

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON moved as an Amendment—In page 1, lines 24 and 25, to leave out from "In-closure Commissioners for England and Wales," to end of line 10 in page 2, and insert, "Trustees of the British Museum."

EARL PERCY asked whether the Government had the consent of the Trustees of the British Museum to undertake these duties, and what reasons the Government had for thinking that those gentlemen were specially fitted for the duties under the Act?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the Government had ascertained that the Trustees of the British Museum were willing to undertake the charge placed upon them by the Bill. The reasons of the Government for choosing those gentlemen were that they believed them to be thoroughly competent to deal with the subjects contained in the Bill, and also with the interests of those possessing ancient monuments, and so give confidence in the working of the Bill without any undue expense to the country.

Clause 3 (Mode of applying Act to Monuments).

MR. RIDLEY, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 20, Sub-section 2, to leave out "subject to appeal in the manner hereinafter provided," and insert, "subject as hereinafter provided," said, he trusted the Committee would see that, by passing this Amendment, the shape of the Bill would be materially improved so far as it related to monuments not mentioned in the Schedule. Her Majesty's Judges had proved themselves competent to decide every description of difficult questions; but he thought they could be hardly expected to say accurately whether a monument was really of ancient Roman or Saxon origin or not. He had ventured to suggest a more suitable mode of appeal by moving his Amendments, which provided that a Return should be annually made to the Houses of Parliament of all monuments to which it was proposed to apply the Act.

EARL PERCY (for Lord FRANCIS HERVEY) moved the following Amendments:—In page 2, line 22, to leave out "is," and insert "being;" in page 2, line 23, to leave out "public," and insert "national;" in page 2, line 23, after "preservation," to insert "would, but for the application of this Act, be in danger of serious injury or destruction." Also in page 2, line 24, after "pleasure ground," to insert—

"Provided always, That this Act shall not be applied for the first time to any Monument after the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and eighty five."

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, he should be happy to accept the second Amendment, but he could not accept the others. Under the first Amendment, the Act could not be applied to any monument without implying that the owner of the monument was likely to destroy it, a suggestion which was far from the intention of the Act.

EARL PERCY thought the hon. Baronet (Sir John Lubbock) had then made a great admission. If these monuments were not in danger of being destroyed, what was the object of the Bill?

MR. BERESFORD HOPE explained that the Bill was intended to apply to monuments which were in danger of destruction from neglect and similar causes, in cases where owners, who lived at a distance perhaps, took insufficient interest in their preservation, though they never would actively sanction their destruction.

MR. SERJEANT SPINKS moved, as an Amendment, to leave out Sub-section 2. His Amendment proposed to prevent the Bill from applying to any ancient monuments, not mentioned in the Schedule, which at any future time might be discovered. There were a considerable number of ancient monuments mentioned in the Schedule of the Bill, and as the Bill had been many years before the House, he thought there was not any great probability of the further discovery of any really important monuments to which this Act ought to be applied. However, after the Bill had become an Act of Parliament, it might be considered beneficial to include newly-discovered ancient monuments under the provisions of the Act—a course which would probably give great annoyance to the proprietors of the land upon which the monuments were discovered. It seemed to him much better not to insert the sub-section, and thus narrow the operation of the Bill to those monuments which at present existed. As far as the monuments mentioned in the Schedule were concerned, every landowner upon whose property they existed had had the opportunity of going before a Select Committee, and that Committee had decided which monuments were fit and proper to be included in the Bill; but as regards future monuments there would be no opportunity of questioning their fitness before a Committee of the House, the only remedy being to go to a Court of Law. He therefore thought it would be much better to accept the Amendment, and then the promoters of the Bill could bring in a Bill in the future to deal with the question of any monuments that might be discovered in the future.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK hoped the hon. and learned Member for Oldham (Mr. Serjeant Spinks) would not press the Amendment, as any monuments which in the future might acquire special interest, perhaps from the destruction of others, would only be dealt with after due consideration.

MR. RIDLEY moved, as an Amendment, to insert in page 2, line 35—

“A Return shall be made to both Houses of Parliament not later than the thirty-first day of March in each year, setting forth every such notice which shall be given during the twelve months next preceding the date of such Return, or since the date of the last Return, and the description and situation of the monument in respect of which each and every of such notices shall have been given; and this Act shall not apply to any monument other than the several monuments specified in the said first Schedule until the expiration of four calendar months from the date of the Return of the notice relating thereto, nor shall this Act apply to any such monument if within the said four calendar months it shall be otherwise ordered by either of the said Houses of Parliament.

“Provided always, That whenever any such notice has been served as aforesaid it shall not be lawful for any person to injure, or to permit injury to be done to the monument specified in such notice between the time of the service of such notice and the expiration of four calendar months from the date of the Return thereof to the said Houses of Parliament as aforesaid, without the consent of the said Commissioners, and whoever shall unlawfully and wilfully so injure or permit injury to be done to any such monument shall be liable to be prosecuted as mentioned in the ninth Section of this Act.”

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Notice to be given to Commissioners of intended injury to a monument to which this Act has been applied).

EARL PERCY moved, as an Amendment, to leave out in page 2, line 38, after “Commissioners” to end of Clause, and insert—

“For a period not exceeding six months from the date of such application. In case the Commissioners shall not within six months from the date upon which this Act shall have been applied to a monument have agreed with the owner to purchase it, or a part thereof, the right of the owner over such monument shall revive and continue to be the same in all respects as if this Act had not been passed.”

He hoped that hon. Members would believe he was reluctant to trespass upon their patience, and he was almost ashamed at that hour to go on at any length. It, however, had not been his wish to do so; and he, therefore, must proceed with his Amendment, which embodied his main objection to the measure before the Committee. He had always objected to the measure, not from any disregard to, or an absence of interest in, these ancient monuments, which all who had any respect for antiquity must venerate, and especially so now that the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Lubbock) had enlightened the world upon these antiquities so well and ably. It made them feel grateful to the ancients for giving the hon. Baronet the opportunity thus to instruct them. But he could find no advantage in the establishment of the precedent contained in the Bill. This was a first attempt to take property compulsorily, for a purpose not distinctly of utilitarian character. If the hon. Baronet had taken steps to inform the House of any real objection to the present system, he should have been in a position to have met him. As far as he was aware, the House was entirely ignorant of the necessity for this measure, except the statement of the hon. Baronet; and, although he was an undoubted authority, he (Earl Percy) thought they should not accept the word of any hon. Member on behalf of a measure which introduced quite a new feature. He could conceive a case, where a landowner was not resident, in which an ancient monument might be neglected; and there it might be desirable to give the Commissioners power to make arrangements with him to take charge of the monument if he was not prepared to see that it was properly preserved.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 38, after the word “Commissioners,” to leave out all the words to the end of the Clause, in order to insert the words “for a period not exceeding six months from the date of such application. In case the Commissioners shall not within six months from the date upon which this Act shall have been applied to a monument have agreed with the owner to purchase it, or a part thereof, the right of the owner over such monument shall revive and continue to be the same in all respects as if this Act had not been passed.”—(Earl Percy.)

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, that perhaps he might be allowed to remind the Committee that Lord Stanhope, the then President of the Society of Antiquaries, had given a strong opinion in favour of the Bill, and that he himself, on several subsequent occasions, had brought forward much evidence on the subject. Therefore, the Committee would see that there was no question of the ipse dixit of any one hon. Member on the subject. As regarded the Amendment, they would by it simply have a board of gentlemen to look after these monuments; but he could not help thinking that the action would be incomplete unless there was a right to purchase. If the House thought it was wise to adopt the Amendment, however, he was quite ready to bow to its decision.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, the Amendment seemed to him to go to the very principle of the Bill, which would be worth very little if it were carried with the Amendment, because it would give power to the owner of a monument by doing nothing to defeat its object.

MR. MACARTNEY was of opinion that the passing of the Amendment would be most desirable. The strong objection to the clause was that an owner would constantly have suspended over him the liability of an action in a superior Court. Then, he thought the manner in which possession was attained by the Bill was exceptional. In other circumstances, where property was taken possession of by the public, it was bound to be paid for beforehand—that was so under the Land Clauses Act. Under this clause they were not bound to do so, without going into a superior Court of Law. That had a most unjust bearing upon a man of small property, who might be the owner of a valuable monument which he did not wish to sell.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, he did not wonder at the opposition of the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney), if he thought those were the principles of the Bill. It was only if the owner wished to destroy the monument that the Commissioners would have the power to purchase it.

MR. HERSCHELL remarked that under the Amendment, if any owner of a monument wished to destroy it, and sweep it from the face of the earth, he had only to hold the Commissioners at arm's length for six months, and then sweep away the monument as if nothing had happened.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 48; Noes 28: Majority 20.—(Div. List, No. 32.)

MR. ONSLOW said, he thought the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Lubbock) ought to be satisfied with the progress that night, and not keep them from their beds any longer in view of the hard work next week. He would move to report Progress.

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Mr. Onslow.)

MR. ANDERSON said, the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow) was the last man who should make that appeal. The hon. Member had been engaged for the last 10 days in constantly counting the House, and causing business to be postponed when it came on at early hours, and now he was in another way preventing its coming on at—not a late hour—10 minutes past 2 A.M.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 34; Noes 38: Majority 4.—(Div. List, No. 33.)

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 (Owners, &c., may require Commissioners either to consent to injury, or to acquire power of restraint); and Clause 6 (Power of restraint in case of injury to a monument), severally agreed to.

Clause 7 (Appeal from Commissioners in certain cases).

On Motion of Mr. HERSCHELL, Clause struck out.

Clause 8 (Acquisition of monuments or of power of restraint by agreement with persons interested); Clause 9 (Penalty on persons unlawfully destroying or injuring a Monument); Clause 10 (Access of Commissioners to monuments); Clause 11 (Proceedings for ascertaining and paying compensation); and Clause 12 (Treasury may authorize expenses), severally agreed to.

Clause 13 (Expenses of the Commission).

EARL PERCY said, he could not let the clause pass without remark. He should like to have some statement from the Government as to the expense to be incurred under the Bill. It should be a consideration for the Government, at a time when money was supposed to be in much demand, whether this expenditure should be sanctioned.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, money would only be expended under the following circumstances. If an owner of a monument wished to destroy it, he would give notice to the Commissioners, who, if they had not already funds in hand, would place the notice before the Treasury. If the Treasury thought proper to expend the money they could do so. If not, the Commissioners' duty would be to communicate this decision to the owner, and the result would be that the monument would be unfortunately destroyed. He did not think the expenditure would be great, as the monuments did not require to be repaired—they simply wanted to be left alone.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, there would be no considerable expense in carrying out the provisions of the Bill.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE remarked that very much the same principle was carried out in France, where no landowner had ever refused to put an ancient monument in his possession under the protection of the law. He supposed that landowners in France were much the same in this respect as those in England. He firmly believed that if this Bill passed into law there would not be a single landowner who would not at once put his monuments under the protection of the Act.

EARL PERCY said, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) was the first person he had ever heard say that landowners in France were in the same position as landowners in England. He must press for the omission of this clause.

MR. HERSCHELL thought the noble Lord (Earl Percy) was under a misapprehension as to this clause. If Parliament did not supply the means for purchase in these instances, the result would be that the monument would be destroyed. That was the only result. If it were not desired by Government to retain the monument, then the Vote for its purchase would not be necessary.

Clause 14 (Reports on monuments).

MR. PELL moved, as an Amendment, to add in page 6, at end of Clause—

"And of the monuments transferred by them to any local authority, or in respect of which any power of restraint has been by them transferred to any local authority under the provisions of this Act."

Amendment agreed to; words added.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 15 (Service of Notices) agreed to.

Clause 16 (Provision for defining the site of a monument).

On the Motion of Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Amendment made, in page 7, line 22, by leaving out from "except" to "situated" in line 25.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

MR. MACARTNEY (for Lord FRANCIS HERVEY) moved, as an Amendment, to insert in page 7, line 32, after "situate," "with the consent of such local authority."

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

MR. PELL moved, as an Amendment, to insert in page 7, line 36, after "Act"—

"Except the power of incurring expenses for the purposes of this Act, and except the duty of reporting to Parliament."

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

EARL PERCY objected to the clause as amended. He could not see the advantage of the action of the local authorities which might gradually devolve upon a Town Council or Board of Guardians.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK hoped the noble Lord opposite (Earl Percy) would not press his objection. As an instance of the authority contemplated under the clause, he might refer to the Devil's Dyke, near Brighton. That was of great interest to the people of Brighton, who had shown a desire to retain it under local control.

Clause, as amended, negatived.

Clause 19 (Saving of informalities).

EARL PERCY thought the clause very comprehensive. In fact, it covered almost everything which could occur.

MR. MARTEN was of opinion that the words covered a large area.

MR. HERSHELL said, it was simply so to cover any informality on immaterial points.

Clause agreed to.

SCHEDULE I.

LORD KENSINGTON moved, as an Amendment, to insert in page 10, after line 26, "the Pentre Evan Cromlech, Pembrokeshire, Nevern."

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

MR. MACARTNEY (for Mr. ELLIOT) moved to leave out, in page 10, line 31, "Cæsar's Camp, Wimbledon."

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, that although the monument was considerably effaced he had consulted his hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Surrey (Sir Henry Peek), who had expressed his opinion that it would be a pity to leave it out.

Schedule II. agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday 10th March, and to be printed. [Bill 89.]

MOTIONS.

ARMY OFFICERS (GUARDS AND LINE).

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MAJOR O'GORMAN moved for an Address for a Return of the nominal roll of all Officers—Guards and Line—who had volunteered for service at the Cape, distinguishing those who had passed the Staff College.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House a Return of the nominal roll of all Officers (Guards and Line) who have volunteered for service at the Cape, distinguishing those who have passed the Staff College."—(Major O'Gorman.)

COLONEL STANLEY said, he could not see the advantage of the Return. It was quite obvious that many officers volunteered over other officers quite as anxious for service. The information would be very voluminous, and he could not understand what purpose it could serve, except to illustrate the fact that certain officers had been sent out to the Cape. These officers would not stand in the way of the promotion of the officers of the 24th or any other regiment. He was bound to demur to the Return.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes None; Noes 53.—(Div. List, No. 34.)
